He lived in a Congressional district that had given to the public service such men as Edwin M. Stanton and John A. Bingham. Mr. Bingham was then representing that district in Congress. He was popular with his constituency not only because of the distinction he has conferred upon them by his conspicuous public services, but also because he was one of the most affable and lovable of men. Only a strong man intellectually, morally, and in a popular sense could succeed such a man to such an honor. But this distinction fell to Captain DANFORD when, in 1872, he was first elected to the House of Representatives. He was soon recognized in that body and throughout the country as worthy to follow his distinguished predecessor.

His habits of thorough study, his sound judgment, and his long and varied experience at the bar made him ready and forceful in debate, and at once, almost, he took his place as one of the strong men of the House. After three terms of service he voluntarily quit public life, that he might devote himself to the practice of his profession, in which he again had the most brilliant success. He was reelected to the House in 1894 and reelected in 1896 and 1898, but died at his home in the county of his birth in 1899, before the Fifty-sixth Congress had convened.

His whole life was a struggle. As a boy with poverty and to acquire an education; later to qualify himself for the practice of the law; as a soldier in the civil war to contribute his full share to the preservation of the Union; as a man to discharge with fidelity the duties of the high positions to which he was called.

He was strong and rugged, both physically and mentally. He was an earnest and constant exemplification of truth and sincerity. He was in all his conduct plain, practical, and straightforward. He relied on his own powers, his own efforts, his own judgment, his own abilities, his own sense of right and justice. In person he was tall and graceful, with a handsome face, a frank, manly countenance, and a polite and attractive address. He had the genius of common sense, and the brilliance of sound judgment and sincere purposes. He was not an orator who dealt in imagery, but he was an easy, logical, eloquent, and forceful speaker, who marshalled facts and presented them with commanding power.

He surmounted all difficulties and attained a high measure of success in all the fields of his labors and efforts.

He was a faithful friend, a devoted husband, a loving father, a splendid type of the American citizen, and an inspiring example for the American youth. His work is done. In the House, where he served so long and so ably, fitting testimony has been given by his colleagues of the uprightness of his life and worth of his services. They have spoken admiringly, tenderly, beautifully, but in it all there has been no insincerity or exaggeration. He was worthy of all that has been said. I can speak no higher praise.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Ohio be adopted?

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, as a further mark of esteem to the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 21, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 20, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NICARAGUAN CANAL.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, some time ago the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce filed a report upon the subject of the Nicaraguan Canal, and the committee agreed that I might file on behalf of the minority a report, which I now ask to file by unanimous consent and have it considered as pending with the majority report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to file a minority report on what is known as the Nicaraguan Canal bill, and that the same may be printed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and that order is accordingly made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself——

Mr. MAHON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the Chair puts the motion. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The Chair will now hear the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. Before that motion can be put, Mr. Speaker, Rule XXIV, which provides for order of business, says that the daily order of business shall be as follows: First, prayer by the Chaplain; second, reading and approval of the Journal; third, corrections of reference of public bills; fourth, disposal of business on the Speaker's table; fifth, unfinished business; sixth, the morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees. I want to ask if this order of business must not be finished before a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules this motion is in order at all times; it is highly privileged, and the question as between the two committees on Claims and War Claims does not come up at this time. When that question comes up, the Chair will pass upon it.

Mr. MAHON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House to give us another day in place of this.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MAHON. I ask the House to vote this motion down. It is in your power to do it if you want to consider bills.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAHON) there were—51 ayes and 53 noes.

Mr. FOSS. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 96, answered "present" 16, not voting 134; as follows:

So the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill was agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was stated the following announcements were made:

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to change my vote. I answered "present" when my name was called, but I wish to vote "no."

The name of Mr. COONEY was again called, and he answered in the negative.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded present.

The name of Mr. MIERS of Indiana being again called, he answered, "Present."

Mr. GAINES. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL. I wish, therefore, to withdraw my vote, which was cast in the negative, and answer, "Present."

The name of Mr. GAINES was again called, and he answered, "Present."

Mr. HULL. I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY. As he did not vote, I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. HULL was again called, and he answered, "Present."

Mr. BARTLETT. On this question I have voted "no," but I wish to withdraw my vote on account of being paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. FOWLER, who has not answered on the roll call.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the affirmative, but I desire to change my vote and be recorded in the negative.

The name of Mr. JOHNSTON was again called, and he answered in the negative.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval bill, which of the Committees on Claims will be entitled to the day?

The SPEAKER. That question is not properly at issue at this time, but the Chair will say to the gentleman that it will be the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROBERTS. Then I desire to change my vote from "no" to "aye."

The name of Mr. ROBERTS was again called, and he answered in the affirmative.

Mr. GILLET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. GAYLE.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. STEELE. I wish to inquire whether I am recorded as present?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is so recorded.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is right.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to change my vote from "no" to "aye."

The name of Mr. ADAMS was again called, and he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening for his name when it was called?

Mr. TATE. I was on the last roll call. I think the Clerk will bear me out that he did not call my name. If he did, I could not hear it.

The name of Mr. TATE was again called, and he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I am paired with the gentleman from California, Mr. METCALF, my colleague on the committee. But I shall permit my vote to stand, as I am quite sure that if he were present he would vote as I have done, in the affirmative.

The following pairs were announced:

For this session:

Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. HALL.

Mr. METCALF with Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky.

Mr. HULL with Mr. HAY.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania with Mr. POLK.

Until further notice:

Mr. LOUD with Mr. NOONAN.
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin with Mr. SCUDDER.
Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. COWHERD.
Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. DE ARMOND.
Mr. PARKER of New Jersey with Mr. BRADLEY.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GIBSON. I understand that if he were present he would vote "aye," and therefore I have taken the liberty to vote "aye."

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. Speaker, I see by the announcement of the pairs that I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BURKE. I did not know that, and not knowing of the arrangement of that pair I voted "aye." If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] did not vote, I wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] did not vote.

Mr. BURKETT. Then I will withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. ESCH. I notice that I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BAILEY. He is not present, and therefore I wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAFF. I voted, but I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. BRUNDIDGE. So I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. JOY. I voted in the negative on this question, but I desire to withdraw my vote, as Mr. JOY is not present.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. VAN VOORHIS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4197. An act to provide for the construction of a revenue cutter for use at Philadelphia, Pa.

S. 4051. An act to authorize the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Big Sandy River from Kenova, W. Va., to Catlettsburg, Ky.

S. R. 116. Joint resolution to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes."

S. 3296. An act to provide for the establishment of a port of delivery at Worcester, Mass.; and

S. 2559. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to redeem or make allowance for internal-revenue stamps.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 8366) to amend section 953 of the Revised Statutes, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on said bill and amendments, and had ordered that Mr. HOAR, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. BACON act as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4 to the bill (H. R. 10449) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CANNON. Before the Clerk proceeds with the reading of the bill, I ask unanimous consent to adopt the following amendment in lieu of the substitute that was adopted yesterday touching the Naval Academy, and to take the place of all the provisions for the Naval Academy down to and including line 13, on page 35.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed substitute, after which the Chair will ask unanimous consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Toward the construction of buildings and for other necessary improvements at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., $350,000: Provided, That before any part of this sum is expended complete plans shall be prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Navy covering all contemplated new buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy and for each and every purpose connected therewith; which plans shall involve a total expenditure of not more than $6,000,000, including the sum of $1,220,000 heretofore appropriated and the sum herein appropriated for said buildings and improvements: Provided further, That after the preparation and approval of the plans herein provided for, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into contract or contracts for any part or all of the improvements and buildings herein authorized, within the said limit of cost, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that this be substituted for the substitute adopted yesterday, and also for the language of the bill from line 24, on page 33, down to and including line 9, on page 34. Is there objection?

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, as this is a time when considerable stress is put upon the matter of changing minds so suddenly, or having them changed by somebody else, I should just like to know from the gentleman from Illinois what is his reason for wanting this change? He made a noble fight yesterday in which I stood by him, as did other gentlemen here, and he was successful. I should like to know whether the gentleman is giving up any of the fruits of his victory.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that there is no change in my mind nor is there any change in this proposition. It is in complete harmony with the amendment, or the substitute that was adopted to the first paragraph under the head of the Naval Academy. Now, unanimous consent is asked that this provision just read shall be in lieu of what the committee did yesterday and in lieu of all other provisions for the Naval Academy, and in substance it limits the cost of all the improvements there to $6,000,000, and provides that no money shall be expended until the plans are perfected within that limit of cost, and then it gives power to the Secretary of the Navy to contract for any or all of the buildings after the plans are approved within the limit. In other words, it applies the contract provision, the same as is done on other large buildings, river and harbor works, and so forth. It is very desirable from the standpoint of economy, and results in harmonious and systematic work.

Mr. TALBERT. It does not increase the appropriation over your other amendment?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. That is what I wanted to know. If it does not increase the appropriation, I have no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Does that interfere with the contract that has already been made for the building of the sea wall and the piling, dredging, and filling in which are already contracted for and in progress?

Mr. CANNON. If any contracts have been made, I suppose they would be lawful and would proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I understand that at present such work is in progress under a contract made for that purpose, and you are eliminating the appropriation to continue that work. If it has that effect, I shall have to object.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not eliminate any appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Why, yes; the gentleman substitutes in the place of an appropriation of $200,000 to continue that work a proposition——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; this $350,000 is in addition to all that has been appropriated, and gives authority to contract for the whole thing besides as soon as the plans are completed within the $6,000,000 limit.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Yes; but the gentleman's substitute must certainly eliminate this provision for the continuing of the work which is now under construction.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, as I understand it, as stated by the Chairman, only goes down to line 9. It does not touch that subsequent matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Oh, yes; it takes in all that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that it only included line 9, page 34; but he is corrected by the Clerk, who states that it goes down to and includes line 13, page 35.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct—line 13, page 35. In other words——

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that this language be substituted for the bill as amended yesterday, from line 24 on page 33 down to and including line 13 on page 35.

Mr. CANNON. That is right. In other words, if this provision is made under this substitute, nothing further will be done toward the erection of any additional buildings or making additional improvements until the plans are made for all the buildings and all the improvements in addition to those that have been made, where contracts have been let, so that all the buildings and improvements will not cost to exceed $6,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Well, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is work under way there now under contract for the building of the sea wall and the piling, dredging, and filling in. There is an appropriation made in the bill as it now stands to continue that work.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend now that there can not be any work under way there that is in excess of $1,200,000, because there was no power to contract except for money appropriated; so that there is no contract in existence in excess of money that is already appropriated, and could not be under the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I understand that while a contract for a certain amount has been authorized and made, the money to carry out the contract has not been appropriated.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; that could not be the case.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I think I can explain this provision to the satisfaction of the gentlemen. This $200,000 is not for the purpose of carrying out any contract already made. There is no contract made for that.

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It is simply to carry out a plan, not a contract.

Mr. BERRY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Has the Secretary of the Navy approved of the plans furnished by Mr. Flagg which have heretofore been presented to this House?

Mr. CANNON. Under no law has he approved the plans.

Mr. BERRY. This House of Representatives has approved the plans and has appropriated money under them.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. I think the United States is committed to Mr. Flagg for the 5 per cent, whether he does the work or not.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. I think the gentleman will find that to be the case when the time comes.

Mr. CANNON. I have examined the case, and he has no claim.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MUDD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to be heard for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Maryland will proceed for three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, if this proposition is the whole of the damage that is contemplated by the gentleman from Illinois, I am not sure that, in view of the amendment adopted by the House yesterday evening, I would object. I would like to have some assurance from the gentleman from Illinois that this is all the damage that he contemplates to inflict on the State of Maryland.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my excellent friend that this is a provision, if adopted, that will be written into the law, so far as the House is concerned, covering the Naval Academy and its complete construction and to complete all the constructions, if this should be enacted into law, just as soon as the plans can be made and the Secretary will construct them. Not only is all the money that has been appropriated available for that construction, but I am so desirous of seeing this work done that this provision provides for a contract up to $6,000,000, less what has been appropriated. Now, then, I have no desire to do any harm to Maryland. Maryland is not concerned any more in this than is Illinois.

Mr. MUDD. That is all right.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. She is in the Union.

Mr. CANNON. So is Illinois in the Union.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know, and I ask permission of the Chair to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MUDD. I will yield always to Georgia, because I think Georgia is generally with Maryland.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am with the gentleman from Maryland in this case. I want to know of the gentleman from Maryland, if the House puts this proposition in the bill by unanimous consent, if that will not prevent the House, when we go into the House from the Committee of the Whole, from having a separate vote on the amendment; in other words, if he by unanimous consent lets this amendment be ingrafted on this bill which is offered as a substitute by the gentleman from Illinois for that which had already been agreed to, if the gentleman from Maryland will be permitted when we go back into the House to have a separate vote, as he gave notice on yesterday evening?

Mr. MUDD. That will not prevent us from getting a vote. This is a small expiation in the morning or atonement of the gentleman from Illinois for the damage inflicted in the evening [laughter]; and if I can understand that this will be the limit of the damage the gentleman from Illinois purposes to do, I should not make any objection here.

Mr. CANNON. This represents the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois that there should not be to exceed $6,000,000 spent in rebuilding the Naval Academy at Annapolis. That is my judgment, that is my voice, and that was the action substantially of the committee.

Mr. MUDD. I have the floor. I have heard that voice and that judgment before.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; and that is all.

Mr. MUDD. And if I can be heard I will be heard here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can be heard if there is no objection to it. His time has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Illinois if this will represent all the voice and all the harm which Illinois proposes to inflict on the State of Maryland and the Naval Academy?

Mr. CANNON. This represents, if adopted, in my opinion, all the money that should go from the United States Treasury into a great public improvement.

Mr. MUDD. Then this is all that the gentleman from Illinois wants?

Mr. CANNON. I believe that this is ample and sufficient, and I believe any more would be extravagance.

Mr. MUDD. Will the gentleman give bond and security that he will not go any further after this amendment shall have been accepted? I would like to know that. I apprehend, however, from the extent to which the gentleman from Illinois has already gone, that this will perhaps be the extent and limit of the damage that he purposes to inflict upon the State of Maryland and the country, and if that be the fact, as his purpose this morning is no worse than he has already inflicted, I should not make objection, though, of course, I will contend against the proposition in any form and in any shape and any place that I shall have an opportunity to do so.

But I take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, that is about the limit to which the gentleman from Illinois purposes to go. I take it for granted from his expression that this brings the proposition of the rebuilding of the Naval Academy down to about the level of parsimony of the gentleman from Illinois; and if the gentleman from Illinois is to be regarded as the exponent of the views and wishes of the House up to the present time and in the committee, I shall not make objection against his proposition, if I could have any sort of assurance that this is the limit to which he proposes to go.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Did that consent adopt the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

The active list of surgeons shall hereafter consist of 55, and that of passed assistant and assistant surgeons of 110. Assistant surgeons shall rank with assistant surgeons in the Army: Provided, That the assistant surgeons appointed for temporary service during the war with Spain, having creditable records, who are now in the Navy may be given permanent commissions as such without limitation as to age: And provided further, That section 13 of the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to provide that nothing therein contained shall operate to reduce the pay which, but for the passage of said act, would have been received by any commissioned officer at the time of its passage or thereafter.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order on this paragraph. This is manifestly new legislation, and I think the point of order ought to be made on the paragraph. I will reserve it to hear from the chairman of the committee in reference to it. I do not want to do anything which shall cripple the service, but I see no reason why the assistant surgeons, provided for by this paragraph, should come into the service as junior lieutenants. I do not see why they should not go through the first grade and rank as other officers are required to do, as do officers of the line. If there is any reason why it should be done, I would be glad to hear it. I do not think it ought to be done myself.

Mr. FOSS. In reply to the gentleman from Arkansas, I beg leave to read what Surgeon-General Van Reypen says, on page 3 of the hearing before the committee:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. If you increase your number, how do you expect to get the places filled?

Surgeon-General VAN REYPEN. By putting the assistant surgeons in the Navy upon the same footing as those in the Army. That is not the case now. The Army has no trouble whatever in filling their corps. We can hardly get any. And I have asked the question very often, "Why is it that we can not get men to go into the Navy, when the Army has no trouble in getting as many as they want?" The answer is, they will not come into the Navy because they have better pay and better rank in the Army, and because in the Navy they go in the steerage. They get better rank and better pay in the Army, as they have more independent positions, and our assistant surgeons at the present time are the only staff officers that have to go in the steerage.

For that reason it is impossible to get the young men, doctors and surgeons, to enter the Navy, because they have to go in the steerage. Now, by giving them a relative rank of those in the Army, they will not go into the steerage, but into the wardroom or mess room with other officers. That is the only reason given by the Surgeon-General before the committee, and he regards it as a very important one for this provision.

Mr. DINSMORE. It is important that the service should have doctors; but it seems to me, and perhaps I should not put my opinion against the opinion of the Surgeon-General, that with the great number of young men who are anxious to get into public service, particularly in the Army and Navy, there should not be any difficulty in getting young doctors to enter the service.

There is a disposition on the part of each one of the different corps of the service to advance themselves as much in rank as possible. Of course that is the natural desire; every man likes to get as much position and every man is pleased to obtain as much rank as he can. I can not understand why the members of the Medical Corps should not be willing to go through the lower grades of rank as other officers do. They are relieved from the rank of ensigns, who have to take their time in the steerage. I have known officers of the Medical and Pay Corps take theirs in the steerage, and I can not see why they should object to it.

Mr. MUDD. There is no grade of ensign in the surgeons' corps.

Mr. DINSMORE. They have the relative grade. He is not an ensign, of course. He is an assistant surgeon. I understand that. Now, there has been for many years a conflict going on in the different branches of the naval service, a bitter controversy between the staff and the line. It was thought by the line that the staff had acquired more rank than they were entitled to, relatively—that they had advantages over the line. The line had to come in from the beginning, go through the Academy, be prepared for the service. Well, they did get some advantages, but in the last Congress we passed the personnel bill, with a view to increasing the efficiency of the service, and we were gratified at the opportunity to settle an old controversy between the line and the staff. We balanced matters up, and they all seemed comparatively contented.

Now, here is manifested again a disposition for one corps to creep along at the expense of some other corps. I do not mean to deprive the other corps of any advantage it now has, except they obtain for themselves the right of precedence on board ship when living in confined quarters. These assistant surgeons will take precedence of the ensigns in the service. It seems to me it is unwarranted and unjustified by the reasons assigned by the Surgeon-General. I believe there are plenty of ambitious young men who will be glad to receive a commission in the naval service and take their course as other officers have done.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, there is a much stronger reason than any which has been suggested why this proposition should be adopted by the committee. The comparison suggested by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] between the position of a medical officer of the Navy and that of a paymaster or junior officer of the line is not altogether logical. An assistant paymaster upon entering his corps does so with the rank of ensign; but he is not eligible if more than 26 years of age. His education need not be of the highest academic order. He must be a good accountant, a man of good intelligence and fair attainments only. An ensign of the line, coming in from the Naval Academy, is appointed to the Academy at an age ranging from 16 to 20, and graduates at the age of 20 to 24. He becomes an ensign at about 22 to 25. But an assistant surgeon in the Navy, with the same rank, may be 30 years of age when appointed. He is subject to a strict professional examination and a careful examination as to his general education before admission; and unless he shall have passed through a thorough academic course and subsequently graduated at some first-class medical college he can not become a medical officer of the Navy.

Now, I take issue with my friend when he states that there are numerous aspiring young surgeons who would be delighted to get into the Medical Corps of the Navy. The experience of the Department indicates otherwise. I know that in my own city, New Orleans, where we have a fine medical school, graduating yearly a large number of young men, I have been unable to induce any of the graduates to enter the naval service, although I have solicited them time and again to do so. They know that if they enter the service they do so at a disadvantage as compared with their brethren who go into the Army, both as to pay, work, and position.

The Surgeon-General of the Navy, in his statement before the Naval Committee, explains the situation explicitly.

He informs us that it is impracticable to fill the vacancies existing in the corps because of the conditions I have stated, and also because junior medical officers in the Navy must go into the steerage. Our assistant surgeons at the present time are the only staff officers that have to go in the steerage. The change proposed would give them the privilege of the wardroom.

By giving them the same rank as the assistant surgeons in the Army, we can get good men to come into the corps; now there is the utmost difficulty in attracting capable and desirable material.

The warrant for the proposed legislation is more fully explained in the following letter, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a proposition for the improvement of the condition of the Medical Corps of the Navy, with a request that it be transmitted to the naval committees of Congress to be incorporated in the naval appropriation bill or otherwise enacted.

It is proposed to add 5 surgeons to the list, making the number 55 instead of 50, as now allowed by law. This would give promotion, without, however, any present increase of rank or pay, to 5 of the senior passed assistants, and accord somewhat to the increase of rank of officers in the line, caused by the personnel bill.

It is also proposed to transfer to the regular service the 15 remaining volunteer assistant surgeons who were in service during the war with Spain and who still remain in service by authority of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, approved May 4, 1898. All of the other volunteer medical officers, 46 in number, have been mustered out of service. The 15 who remain are desirous of being transferred to the regular service, but 9 of them are beyond the age limit prescribed by the present law, which limits the age of admission to 30. The eldest of the 15 is 37, and the youngest 24; 9 of them are now at sea. None of them can ever be promoted if they retain their present status, whereas if they were transferred to the regular service they would be in the line of promotion, which they deserve for their intelligent service and honorable record during and since the war with Spain.

The transfer of these officers would partly fill the increase asked for, which is 5 surgeons and 20 passed assistant and assistant surgeons. There are now 5 vacancies in the regular service, which, with the 10 additional vacancies made by the proposed increase of the corps, would make 15 vacancies in the list of assistant surgeons.

The Bureau would despair of ever filling these vacancies unless the assistant surgeons in the Navy were put on the same footing as assistant surgeons in the Army, as provided for in the accompanying proposition. Assistant surgeons are now the only staff officers assigned to the junior officers' quarters. Assistant paymasters are always alone on board ship, and, as the head of a department, occupy quarters in the ward room. Assistant engineers have been transferred to the line by the personnel bill. I have made repeated inquiry of medical students and civil practitioners as to the reason why we can not get candidates to appear for examination for appointment as assistant surgeons in the Navy, and the almost universal reply is, "Because they have to go in the steerage." If assistant surgeons in the Navy were given the rank of junior lieutenant, corresponding to the rank of first lieutenant in the Army, the rank given to assistant surgeons in the Army on entrance, this marked inequality and disparagement would not exist, and we would stand an equal chance with the Army of getting well qualified men to fill the lower grade.

The increase of numbers in the lower grades asked for is imperatively necessary in view of the large addition to the enlisted force of the Navy and the establishment of hospitals and sick quarters in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Guam, and Habana. It is simply impossible with the present force to provide adequate medical attendance. Ships and stations are left without assistant surgeons, and the Medical Department of the Navy can not be conducted in the efficient condition that it is the desire of the Bureau to maintain.

Very respectfully, W. K. VAN REYPEN, Surgeon-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

The act also proposes opportunity to embrace the 15 remaining volunteer surgeons who served patriotically and efficiently in the war with Spain in the permanent service. These are now well trained and competent and are much needed.

The health of the personnel, so vital to the efficiency of our Navy, is dependent upon a thoroughgoing, accomplished, and capable corps of surgeons, and I trust that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], whose zeal for the welfare of the Navy is well known and whose services for its progress and efficiency are not surpassed by any member of this House, will not insist upon his point of order, but allow the House to consider the matters involved upon their merits.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cripple any branch of the service; but it would seem by the statement of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] that the object of the provision in the bill is to offer an inducement to these officers to enter the naval service. Sir, the time will never come when officers of the line and staff will not be not only willing but anxious to get promotion. We all know that persons in the Government service are looking out for this all the time. I am willing that these officers should be promoted when they deserve it; but I do not think it right, by a general provision in an appropriation bill, to provide that a particular corps of the service shall be filled by men in advance of the rank at which they have hitherto come in. As stated by my friend from Louisiana, the inducement is rank and pay. My friend says that young men can not be induced to enter this service. I should like to have the opportunity to furnish some from my district.

Mr. FOSS. Does the gentleman from Arkansas insist on the point of order?

Mr. DINSMORE. I think I shall have to do so.

Mr. FOSS. I will state that this is a new provision of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. DINSMORE. These gentlemen are members of the committee and more familiar with this matter than I am. If they will tell me that the service will be crippled if this point of order be insisted upon—that it will prevent this corps from being filled up—I am willing to defer to their judgment.

Mr. DAYTON. Unquestionably we can not build up this service unless some provision be made that will place the surgeons on the same rank as officers of corresponding rank in the Army.

Mr. DINSMORE. Although I am apprehensive that we may have as a result of this action a repetition of the same experience that we had prior to the personnel bill, I withdraw the point of order. I warn gentlemen that other corps will be here making a similar demand.

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "surgeons," in line 2, page 38, the words "under the age of 50 years;" and also by striking out after the word "commissions," in line 4 of the same page, the words "as such without limitation as to age;" so that the clause will read:

Provided, That the assistant surgeons under the age of 50 years, appointed for temporary service during the war with Spain, having creditable records, who are now in the Navy, may be given permanent commissions.

Mr. FOSS. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the amendment is not subject to a point of order. It is germane to the pending paragraph.

Mr. MAHON. My reason for offering the amendment is this: In my view no man now in the service who is over 50 years of age should be given a permanent position whereby he may very soon be placed on the retired list. I do not know that it is a fact, but it strikes me that the provision as it now stands has been worded so as to cover some gentleman who has reached that age.

Now, in the act passed in the last Congress we limit the appointment to 50 years. That is to say, that no man who has passed 50 years is eligible and could be put into the permanent service so as to allow a year or two of service and then get on the retired list.

I make the amendment, Mr. Chairman, because we must watch this retired list carefully and not allow it to grow too long. It is a liberal amendment and ought to prevail.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee, we accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Provisions, Navy: For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes in cases of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officer, commuted rations for officers on sea duty (other than commissioned officers of the line, medical and pay corps and chief warrant officers) and naval cadets, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited to the naval hospital fund, subsistence of officers and men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given), labor in general storehouses and paymasters' offices in navy-yards, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased under the naval-supply fund; one chemist, at $2,500 per annum, and two chemists, at $2,000 each per annum, $2,500,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move an amendment to the paragraph just read. On conference with the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I think the suggestion I make is acceptable to him.

I move, on page 38, line 20, to strike out the words "warrant officers" in that line and substitute therefor the words "chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief sailmakers, chief carpenters;" so that that provision of the bill included within the parenthesis points may read:

Other than commissioned officers of the line, medical and pay corps and chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief sailmakers, chief carpenters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was again read as stated by Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. FOSS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like some explanation of the necessity for the amendment. What difference would it make? These are warrant officers now.

Mr. BUTLER. The amendment applies only the rank given to these officers by the Navy Department.

Mr. SOUTHARD. They are not commissioned officers.

Mr. CUMMINGS. All right; I see no objection to it.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For freight and express charges, fuel, books and blanks, stationery, advertising, furniture for general storehouses and pay offices in navy-yards, expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for same, postage, telegrams, telephones, tolls, ferriages, yeoman's stores, iron safes, newspapers, ice, transportation of stores purchased under the naval-supply fund, and other incidental expenses, $150,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This provision makes an appropriation for the expenses of a naval clothing factory and machinery for the same. We find the Government going into the business of making naval clothing, of course for our naval officers, and from what I have read as to the enterprise it has proven to be successful so far.

Without taking up the time of the committee for a statement on that subject, I desire the privilege, without reading it, to insert in the RECORD a short article I have in my hand, on the subject of the manufacture of armor plate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a certain document relating to the manufacture of armor plate. Is there objection?

Mr. MERCER. We could not hear the request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MUDD. Will the Chair please state it again?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article relative to armor-plate manufacture which he presents. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GAINES. Then, Mr. Chairman, while I did not desire to take up the time of the committee, I will read the article myself.

During the reading the following proceedings took place:

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw the objection I have made to print the document referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there further objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAHON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is too late. Consent has been given.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman had a right to object.

Mr. GAINES. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will continue the reading. I was going to read it, and the gentleman might just as well allow its insertion in the RECORD. My only desire was to save time.

Mr. BUTLER. We can not hear what the gentleman is reading.

Mr. GAINES. I can state to the gentleman that it is evident they do not desire to hear what I am reading, but, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed with the reading.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. MILLER. Then I desire to raise the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. GAINES. Then I move to strike out the next two words.

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] will suspend. The gentleman from Kansas rises to a point of order.

Mr. MILLER. My point of order is that the article which the gentleman from Tennessee is reading is not germane to the paragraph under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. GAINES. I say it is germane, for the simple reason——

The CHAIRMAN. It is not germane to this paragraph.

Mr. GAINES. It is germane for the simple reason that we are appropriating money here to establish a Government factory——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is cut of order. The Chair has already ruled.

Mr. GAINES. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the formal amendment withdrawn?

Mr. GAINES. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. GAINES. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GAINES then proceeded with the reading of the article, which is given in full below.

Mr. MAHON. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the paragraph of the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that the article is not germane to the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GAINES. Will the Chair let me finish this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the power of the Chair so to do, the gentleman from Pennsylvania having made the point of order.

Mr. GAINES. I hope the House will let me finish this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has already been decided, and it is not in the power of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so to do.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert this whole article in the RECORD for the information of the House. It is a very able article, written on the subject of the making of armor plate and the building of ships by the Government. The author of it is well known to me, and deserves great credit for what he has accomplished.

I have known him from boyhood, and there was never a prize offered in any class from the time he left the common schools in my city until he graduated at Annapolis, and still later in Europe in a like school, that he did not take first prize. He is now one of the most distinguished members connected with our Navy.

I ask that this be inserted in the RECORD, not only for its merit but in compliment to this young author, a man who differs with me in politics, but who is distinguished in his profession—a credit to himself and an honor to his country. I withhold his name.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert this article in the RECORD. Is there objection? There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The United States Government has at present no shops nor appliances for the manufacture of armor.

When an armored ship is appropriated for the contract for the ship proper is let to some shipbuilding firm, and the contract for the armor proper is let to some armor-making firm. The result is the builder of the ship has no authority over the question of the method of manufacture or of the time of delivery of the armor.

The ship contractor furnishes drawings and models to the armor contractor, who in turn manufactures the armor subject to Government inspection, and ships the same to the ship contractor, who fits the armor in place on the ship. The manufacture of armor, being rather a limited industry, is practically in the hands of a few concerns, and the Government is practically at their mercy as regards time of delivery and cost.

Moreover, there always have been, and probably always will be under this system, cases where the ship contractor blames the armor contractor for slowness in delivery of armor, and the armor contractor blames the ship contractor for slowness in furnishing such data as is necessary to complete the armor. The Government acts as a sort of go-between in such cases, and invariably so far has suffered from long delays in the completion of the ships, and has been put to great expense for the claims of the ship contractors that they are entitled to fees for the care and preservation of ships because the ships are ready and the armor is not.

This could be obviated in either of two ways: First, the contract to be let for the ship and armor as a whole, the ship contractor being therefore made responsible for the prompt delivery and completion of both ship and armor. Second, the Government to establish its own armor plant and build its own ships in its navy-yards.

The existence of a Government armor plant would be advisable for the following reasons:

Whatever haste might be considered necessary in the completion of armor could be obtained, as there would be no work other than that of making armor, while in the present armor plants there is always a good deal of work besides Government work going on, and it may safely be said that Government work is always put to one side and outside work given preference, the contractor depending on political influence to avoid any penalty that might be imposed by his contract with the Government.

The initial cost of an armor plant would not be excessive in view of the large saving in the price of the armor to be effected; in view of the fact that officers, in any case on the pay roll, would superintend such plant; in view of the decreased cost of vessels and the decrease in time required before they are ready for sea; in view of the fact that the existence of such armor plant would give employment to a large number of men thoroughly familiar with the work, who would form a standing force for any other work of a similar nature that might be required, the blacksmiths, forgers, and machinists employed in an armor plant being men capable of doing almost any kind of ship work, and in view of the fact that in cases of emergency the Government is not at the mercy of contractors who may have other work on hand that they prefer to finish, but that the Government with its own armor plant could expedite its work as might be found desirable.

SHIPBUILDING.

When a ship is appropriated for by Congress, advertisements for bids for the construction of such ship are issued by the Navy Department, and the contract for the ship is awarded to the lowest bidder. Such contract usually includes the ship and engines complete, other contracts being let for the armor, while the armament, ship's miscellaneous fittings, small boats, etc., are made by the Government.

It is necessary at each of the works where Government ships are being built to detail a number of officers with large office forces composed of draftsmen, special mechanics, etc., to interpret the specifications for the contractors, see that the work is done properly, to work out details, and to make finished plans and calculations for the ships, it often happening that the naval officers so detailed virtually get up all the details for the construction of the ship.

In the case of a large shipbuilding programme it is advisable for the general interest of the Government that certain of the work go to private firms, but it is also essential that in all cases certain of the ships should be built in the Government navy-yards.

The plants of the various navy-yards are to-day not in the condition and efficiency of a first-class shipbuilding yard, but with comparatively slight expenditure, each one of the important yards could readily be fitted to build as efficiently a ship as any shipyard in the country. The cost of building the ship would be no greater than the amount paid by the Government to the contractors, as in contract prices there is always a certain profit; any changes that the Government might desire to make after the contract has once been let have to be paid for, and a large amount has to be spent for superintendence and inspection.

Moreover, in case each of the important navy-yards had a certain number of ships building, there would always be at work in the yard a large number of skillful, competent mechanics, forming a steady navy-yard force; and whenever it became necessary to make urgent repairs to ships forming the fleet, these steady employees would be available for such work.

Repairs of necessity have to be made in a navy-yard where the people are familia, with the fittings and details of men-of-war and with the requirements of the service, and it is often a serious question to obtain good men for this work, as under present conditions no large number of men can be employed continuously, as repair work does not last long, and men are not willing to take employment where it may only be for a few weeks or at most for a few months. With a steady force that would be employed on new ships, men could be drafted therefrom as occasion demanded for repair work, and when such repair work was completed these men could be returned to the new work.

Also, the Government doing its own work, much of the present difficulty in making any slight change that might be found desirable would be avoided, and the Government would be sure of good results.

The tendency of a contractor of any kind is to do his work as cheaply as possible, although, of course, many, in fact most, of them are desirous of doing good work. With work done in a navy-yard it would be to the interest of everyone concerned to have the work done as well as possible.

Navy-yards are a necessity, as the navy-yard is the base of a fleet, where supplies are kept and repairs are made. The Navy has also a skilled corps of officers, who have been educated at great expense in the various branches necessary for a successful shipbuilder. The efficiency of the Navy in this respect is shown by the efficient condition of all of its vessels during the late war, all of which were built under the supervision of the Navy and repaired and fitted out in the navy-yards.

All the sea powers of Europe maintain large naval stations where, in addition to the furnishing of supplies and the repairing of ships, the building of new ships is done. The United States alone has allowed its navy-yards to be practically deserted as far as new construction is concerned.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, civil establishment, Bureau of Steam Engineering, $13,200; and no other fund appropriated by this act shall be used in payment for such service.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a separate paragraph to come in after line 13, page 50.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Insert after line 13, page 50, the following:

"That section 422 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'The Chief of the Bureau of Engineering shall be appointed from the line of officers of the Navy, not below the grade of lieutenant-commander, and shall be a skilled engineer.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Insert as a separate paragraph, after line 13, page 50, the following:

"That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consolidate the three Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment into one bureau, to be known as the bureau of ships, the consolidation to take effect at such time as the Secretary of the Navy shall designate."

Mr. FOSS. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. RIXEY. The reasons for that amendment are so well stated——

Mr. MAHON. I make the point direct that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. RIXEY. Will not the gentleman withhold the point of order until I can state some of the reasons——

Mr. MAHON. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman insists on the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair has no doubt that it is new legislation. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy: For 1 professor of mathematics, 1 of chemistry, 1 of physics, and 1 of English, at $2,500 each; 7 professors, namely, 1 of English, 1 of French and Spanish, 3 of French, 1 of Spanish, and 1 of drawing, at $2,200 each; 1 sword master, at $1,500, and 2 assistants, at $1,000 each; 1 instructor in gymnastics, at $1,200; 1 assistant librarian, at $1,800; 1 secretary to the Naval Academy, at $1,800; 2 clerks to the Superintendent, at $1,200 each; 1 clerk to the commandant of cadets, at $1,200; 1 clerk to the paymaster, at $1,200; 1 dentist, at $1,600; 1 baker, at $900; 1 mechanic in department of physics, at $730; 1 cook, at $525.50; 1 messenger to the Superintendent, at $900; 1 armorer, at $649.50; 1 chief gunner's mate, at $529.50; 1 quarter gunner, at $469.50; 1 cockswain, at $469.50; 1 seaman in the department of seamanship, at $397.50; 1 attendant in the department of navigation and 1 in the department of physics, at $300 each; 6 attendants at recitation rooms, library, store, chapel, and offices, at $900 each; 1 bandmaster, at $1,080; 21 first-class musicians, at $420 each; 7 second-class musicians, at $360 each; services of organist at chapel, $300; in all, $59,991.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I will say that this amendment reduces the number of professors and is in accord with the wishes of the new Superintendent, Captain Wainwright.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 50 strike out all in line 18, after the word "each" and all in line 19 to the word "and," at the end of the line, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "four professors, namely, one of English, two of French:" and insert after the word "each," in line 20, "one assistant professor of Spanish at $1,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract two seagoing battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, upon a trial displacement of about 13,500 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $3,600,000 each; three armored cruisers of about 13,000 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,250,000 each; and three protected cruisers of about 8,000 tons trial displacement, carrying the most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class and to have the highest speed compatible with good cruising qualities, and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $2,800,000 each; and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery; and not more than two of the vessels herein provided for shall be built in one yard or by one contracting party; and in the construction of all said vessels all the provisions of the act of March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," shall be observed and followed; and subject to the provisions hereinafter made two and not more than two of the aforesaid vessels shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or in the waters connecting therewith: Provided, That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President from the biddings for such contracts, when the same are opened and examined by him, that said vessels, or any of them, can not be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean at a cost not exceeding 4 per cent above the lowest accepted bid for the other vessels provided for in this act, he shall authorize the construction of said vessels, or either of them, elsewhere in the United States, subject to the limitations as to cost hereinbefore provided.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63, line 4, after the word "each," insert "and six light-draft composite gunboats of about 900 tons displacement, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy, and no one of which shall cost more than $230,000, or in all for said six gunboats $1,380,000, exclusive of armament, and no more than two of said gunboats shall be built in one yard or by one contracting party, and in each case the contract shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest and best responsible bidder."

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Secretary of the Navy in his report asked for the construction of 12 of these small gunboats. It does seem to me that his recommendation ought to have been recognized by the committee to the extent of authorizing the construction of at least half that number, and as the committee has not seen fit to recommend the construction of any, that the House should take the matter into its own hands and add to the Navy at least six more of these composite gunboats.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman, does not your amendment limit the competition, inasmuch as you say that the Secretary of the Navy shall not permit more than two of these ships to be constructed in any one yard?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I take the language proposed in the provision that was submitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs and voted down.

Mr. SNODGRASS. But when one of them gets a contract, then that eliminates him from competing with any other firm.

Mr. CUMMINGS. We provide that no more than two can be constructed in any one yard. When the Secretary came before the committee and was questioned in regard to the construction of these gunboats, Mr. DAYTON said:

I do not like the idea of building small crafts until we get thoroughly equipped vessels of the cruiser and battle-ship class. Do you think those are preferable to the battle ships?

Secretary LONG. I should think that at present these gunboats of 900 and 1,000 tons are perhaps the most useful vessels we could have. In the Philippines at the present time a battle ship has very little to do; the work is done by the smaller boats.

Mr. DAYTON. We have a good many of those small boats on hand now, have we not? Understand I am not speaking of the cruisers, but the question was in regard to these small gunboats.

Secretary LONG. They are very useful to us. Take the torpedo boats; we have a very good showing of those, but torpedo boats are not useful in peace. A torpedo boat is not useful in ordinary times; it is only a fighting boat.

He was questioned further, and the Secretary referred the committee to Admiral Dewey. Admiral Dewey, in reply to questions put to him concerning the gunboats, said that we had acquired by purchase twelve or thirteen Spanish gunboats, including those that had been wrecked and raised from the bottom after the battle of Manila Bay. Further along he said, in reply to a question of Mr. Metcalf:

Admiral DEWEY. I think the Secretary of the Navy could answer you; he knows the condition perhaps of these gunboats, and although perhaps we may have a large number on the list, many of them may count for nothing, so I am not prepared to speak.

Mr. MUDD. Did I understand you would recommend gunboats as an alternative proposition?

Admiral DEWEY. No; that is another thing. We have just bought 14 gunboats.

Mr. DAYTON. I just simply took the Naval Register on page 170 there, if I may be pardoned——

Admiral DEWEY. Does not that include some auxiliary vessels we bought?

Mr. DAYTON. Now, under the third rate, here is the Bennington, the Concord, the Yorktown—those are larger. Coming down here are the Machias, the Don Juan de Austria, the Isla de Luzon.

Secretary LONG. We captured those.

Mr. DAYTON. Then we have the Alert, the Ranger, the Annapolis, the Vicksburg, the Wheeling, the Marietta, the Newport, and Princeton, of 1,000 tons.

Secretary LONG. Those are new boats.

Mr. DAYTON. Then we go down to the Petrel, which is 892 tons, which is about the size you are asking for, and the Scorpion, the Fern, and the Bancroft.

Secretary LONG. Then you are getting to vessels which are auxiliary vessels.

Mr. DAYTON. Then comes the Vixen and the Gloucester.

Secretary LONG. Those are the converted yachts which we purchased during the war.

Mr. DAYTON. Then comes the Wasp, the Frolic, the Dorothea, the El Cano, the Pinta, the Stranger, the Peoria, the Hist, the Eagle, the Hornet, etc.

Secretary LONG. A great many of those are big tugboats and yachts.

Mr. DAYTON. I could not tell anything about them, but I noted them under the head of gunboats, and that we had sixty and something.

Secretary LONG. Many of them have been turned over to the States for their naval reserves.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope you will not misunderstand me. I do not oppose the building of small vessels where necessary, but I am very anxious to get this larger and stronger and more substantial part of the Navy built up.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Have you now any gunboats building?

Secretary LONG. No; the gunboats are all finished. They are very useful for patrolling, etc.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Admiral Dewey acknowledged that the Secretary knew more about the necessity of these gunboats than he did, and as the Secretary, in his examination before the committee, did not see fit to withdraw his request for the building of 12 new gunboats, I think that justice requires that we should give him at least one-half of what he asked for.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, is it the desire of the committee to dispose of this particular amendment before we enter into consideration of any other item there?

Mr. FOSS. I think that it will be better to dispose of this item first.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will then speak to this item. It seems to me, from Admiral Dewey's testimony in the statement that my friend from New York has just read and the immense amount of money that we are already expending for the Navy, that we can well do without these gunboats.

If the members of the Naval Committee will remember, the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy were made some time in the fall, and Admiral Dewey was before the committee on February 28, probably three or four months after the Navy Department had made out their estimates. Admiral Dewey said in that hearing that General Otis had just recently—a few days before, as I understood—turned over 3 gunboats to our Navy in the Philippines; and Admiral Dewey told us also that we had recently bought 14 Spanish gunboats that were in good condition in the Philippine Islands. I understand, therefore, there are 17 more gunboats now in the Navy than were in the Navy when the Secretary of the Navy made his report asking for 12, this being the number, as I recall, first recommended.

Mr. FOSS. That is it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Navy asked for 12 in the fall, and since that time we have acquired 17—14 and 3. So we now have more than the Secretary asked. Another thing. I think Admiral Dewey expressed the opinion—I will not take time to read his testimony, although I have it in my hand—that the kind of ships we want in war are cruisers and battle ships, and that we can make out very well at present without the gunboats.

While the gunboats themselves are not very expensive, every gentleman in this House is aware that the Navy is expensive, and wherever we can save the money of the Treasury without harming the American Navy I think we ought to make that saving. I feel that every member of the House would be fully justified in voting against this amendment.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the words of Admiral Dewey:

Mr. METCALF. The question I asked was, if the committee of the House would authorize the construction of three additional battle ships at this particular time, would you then recommend the construction of gunboats; that is, supposing we could get both?

Admiral DEWEY. I think the Secretary of the Navy could answer you; he knows the condition, perhaps, of these gunboats, and although, perhaps, we may have a large number on the list, many of them may count for nothing, so I am not prepared to speak.

Mr. KITCHIN. From what page is the gentleman reading?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Secretary of the Navy maintained his attitude——

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that Admiral Dewey thinks the gunboats purchased from Spain are first-class.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us see. I read from the testimony before the committee:

Mr. METCALF. Suppose the committee should authorize the construction of three battle ships in addition to the construction of the armored cruisers, etc., do you then recommend the construction of the 12 gunboats also?

Admiral DEWEY. No. That is to say, I would not. I, however, would not want to give an opinion upon that because I am not familiar with the workings of the Department; but in view of what Mr. DAYTON says that we having something over 50 and the purchases we have recently made—I see General Otis has just turned over three more of the Spanish gunboats—I think the gunboats had better wait for the fighting ships.

Mr. DAYTON. That is, you would build them, but after the battle ships?

Admiral DEWEY. Yes.

Mr. METCALF. The question I asked was if the committee of the House would authorize the construction of three additional battle ships at this particular time would you then recommend the construction of gunboats; that is, supposing we could get both?

Admiral DEWEY. I think the Secretary of the Navy could answer you; he knows the condition, perhaps, of these gunboats, and although perhaps we may have a large number on the list many of them may count for nothing, so I am not prepared to speak.

Mr. MUDD. Did I understand you would recommend gunboats as an alternative proposition?

Admiral DEWEY. No; that is another thing. We have just bought 14 gunboats.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, right there. I find a list of the gunboats, with those captured from the Spanish Government. On page 42 of the report on the naval bill I find this. Instead of being first-class boats of 900 tons, as the Secretary asked for, I find that three of them are of 106 tons displacement, steel; three, 208 tons, steel; three of 151 tons, iron; six of 83 tons, wood. Now, some of them are not as large as an Erie Canal boat.

Mr. KITCHIN. What was the date of that report?

Mr. CUMMINGS. That is on page 42 of the report on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does that include the boats that Admiral Dewey referred to?

Mr. CUMMINGS. It says "boats purchased by the War Department."

Mr. KITCHIN. How many of them?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Nineteen.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will remember we bought other gunboats; I think many others.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Six of them were captured from Spain, and that leaves 13 purchased.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, let me read further from Admiral Dewey's testimony. He says, on pages 8 and 9 of the hearings:

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the Secretary, in view of the statement made by the Admiral that we have recently purchased quite a number of gunboats through General Otis to be turned over to the Government, does he think in view of that fact it would be necessary to build these dozen gunboats recommended?

Secretary LONG. I can not answer you very clearly about that, because I do not know much about these gunboats which have been turned over, in what condition they are in. Have you any information on that, Admiral?

Admiral DEWEY. I know these last ones which have been turned over in the last week. One of them—the Alava—is about 600 tons and is a fine ship. They are very good in the Philippines.

Secretary LONG. I should certainly think if we get the three additional ships from the Army which the Army has given to us, that would certainly modify the necessity of increasing the gunboats in your bill; I should certainly think so; but I can not answer very definitely, because I do not know what the ships are and what condition they are in.

Mr. RIXEY. You would utilize those three gunboats?

Secretary LONG. I should be glad to. You gentlemen must bear in mind in making the recommendation it never occurred to me that Congress would give us three battle ships, costing $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 apiece, and also three cruisers costing a great deal of money, and three protected cruisers of 8,000 tons, also costing a great deal.

Secretary Long says that if we get three additional ships that would remove the necessity of increasing the gunboats. That refers to the three that General Otis had just turned over.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But those three are only 106 tons burden.

Mr. KITCHIN. What page is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Page 42 of the report.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is that ship, the Alava, that Admiral Dewey mentions in your list?

Mr. CUMMINGS. The Alvarado is in this list, but not the Alava.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the Alava is a 600-ton ship, and Admiral Dewey says she is a fine ship.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. What kind of a ship is it—iron, steel, or wood?

Mr. KITCHIN. He does not state.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Six of these ships captured from the Spaniards are practically Erie Canal boats—only 93 tons.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think we bought any ships of that kind; we might have captured some.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 8 of this hearing, where Secretary Long says:

There are about 35 of those which are vessels of 500 tons or less; some less than 100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk as an amendment to that offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, are we through with the debate on this amendment?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, no; we are not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I asked if it was proper to offer another amendment to this section, and the chairman of the committee said he would prefer to get through with this amendment before another was offered.

Mr. FOSS. I would prefer to have this settled first.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I believe I have the floor. After I have occupied my five minutes I will cheerfully give way to gentlemen on either side to make any agreement that they may think proper.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to offer my amendment before any other amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was entitled to the floor. His time expired, and he sat down. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the Chair understood what passed between the chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] and myself; and, understanding that, I did not think he would recognize another gentleman to offer an amendment until the settlement of the first amendment, as we understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not presume that the gentleman from North Carolina was holding the floor without the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I am entitled to my rights on the floor. There is no objection to the gentleman from North Carolina offering an amendment after I get through.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well; go ahead. I will not insist on anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] after the words "exclusive of armament" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "these gunboats to be built under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Navy in such Government navy-yards as are best suited for this purpose, the selection to be made by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I make a point of order against that amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. FOSS. I also make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentlemen be kind enough to reserve the point of order until I have spoken? I have not occupied any time on this bill. I wish they would reserve the point of order until I have occupied my five minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I reserve the point of order until the gentleman has spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to the arguments which have been made by those opposed to the building of some of our war ships in Government yards, and I am still strongly of the opinion that it is the duty of the Government to give this matter a trial at least, and if this is done I feel confident that in a short time it will be shown that ships can be built more cheaply and better constructed than in private yards. The Charlestown Navy-Yard is situated in my district. I am fully acquainted with its possibilities in this direction, and I think it is only fair that Congress should afford an opportunity for the construction of one or more war ships in this yard.

Within the last three or four years millions of dollars have been spent to put this yard in proper shape, so as to enable it to repair and reconstruct almost every kind of ship in the United States

Navy. At the present time a dry dock, to cost more than a million dollars, is being completed, and Government buildings containing the most modern shipbuilding machinery are being built. Within a radius of 10 miles of the Charlestown Navy-Yard live more than 1,000,000 people, and amongst this vast number may be found the best mechanics in the world. It is inconceivable to me that the United States Government should spend millions of dollars in fitting up Government plants at this and other navy-yards and not at the same time undertake to build as well as repair Government vessels.

Arguments have been adduced on this floor citing the case of the four vessels built in the Government yards, viz, the battle ships Texas and Maine and the cruisers Raleigh and Cincinnati, and it has been pointed out that these vessels cost a much larger sum than that for which they could have been built in private yards. This statement has, however, been disputed, and I think it was Constructor Bowles who made the statement at one of the hearings before the Naval Committee that a great deal of this additional cost was due to the delay of the Government in providing plans, armor, and armament, and that Messrs. Cramp & Co., who were building vessels about the same time, have a claim now before Congress amounting to over $400,000, which, if allowed, would make this vessel, the Indiana, I believe, cost as much as the Texas.

The figures which I submit below show the difference between contract and actual cost and give a fair idea of conditions prevailing when these vessels were built years ago.

Every member of Congress knows the condition in which the Norfolk and Brooklyn navy-yards were at the time of the building of these vessels. Members of the House must realize that neither of those yards was in a condition to build Government vessels in competition with private yards. Neither yard had tools or machinery at that time compared to what can be found there now, and it is not fair argument to make comparisons in the cost of vessels built at these navy-yards at that time and the cost of doing similar work there now. When members of this House declaim against the building of Government vessels at our navy-yards they make unwarranted charges against the efficiency of our whole system of navy-yard construction and repair now in vogue at the different navy-yards in the country.

Who are the men that recommend the construction of Government vessels in our navy-yards? The chief constructor of the Navy, Admiral Hichborn, and he is sustained, I think, by every naval constructor in the country. These men, or nearly all of them, are graduates of our Annapolis Naval Academy, and are therefore the best fitted and best trained men in the world to-day in this class of work. Under the system of civil service in operation at the navy-yards, mechanics and laborers are given employment and retained in the service in accordance with their fitness for their duties, and it is a well-established fact that during the last seven or eight years the navy-yards of the country have been operated upon as economical a scale as are the private shipyards.

Claim has been made here that while the employees of private shipyards work ten hours a day those engaged in Government work are only compelled to work eight hours a day. This difference in time, however, can not exist long. The sentiment of the country, and I might say the sentiment of the entire world, is, in my opinion, for a working day of eight hours, and I think it is the duty of this Congress in making appropriations for the ships that are to be built in private yards to insist, as can be done in the present bill, that in the construction of all Government vessels in private yards the mechanics and laborers employed on these vessels should not be allowed to work more than eight hours per day.

I am surprised that large shipbuilding concerns should exact any longer service than this, as it is generally admitted that the average mechanic can accomplish as much in eight hours as he can in ten, and inasmuch as a great many of the trades in this country to-day are on an eight-hour basis, and practically all on a nine-hour basis, it seems to me almost criminal on the part of this Government to allow any of the Government vessels to be built in private yards on a ten-hour basis. All the other governments of the world have instituted this practice and find it a profitable one, otherwise the amount of shipbuilding which other countries have given to their own government yards during the last year would never have been authorized.

I will present at this time some of the statements which were made by the different naval constructors who appeared before the committee at the hearings on this matter. Mr. Bowles, speaking generally, said the advantages to be gained by the building of ships in Government yards were as follows:

1. Maintains efficiency of force and plant.
2. Renders repair work economical and rapid.
3. Will reduce the amount of repair work by removing the necessity for maintenance of force.
4. Maintains a standard of workmanship and design on basis of practical experience.
5. Provides training for those who must inspect contractors' work.
6. No profit to be made.
7. The indirect charges in commercial practice which make a large percentage of cost are not included, because they are already provided and are maintained for other purposes, viz: Interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation and care of property, large proportion of office and organization expense.
8. Cost of inspection is saved.
9. Cost of trial trip is saved.

Mr. Bowles also said:

The English Government has shown that a government can build ships in competition with outside shipyards. Nobody can say we can not do it, because we can. It is only a matter of the means, the regulation, and the methods and the men. And it can be done, and it can be done very quickly; if you want to do it very quickly there is no question about it.

There is just one sentence more, and that is, I believe in time gone by, when we had a wooden navy, the greater portion of our ships were built acceptably in the Government yards. At one time ships were built here in the Washington yard.

Mr. Bowles also said, in answer to a question of Mr. DAYTON as to the capability of the navy-yards for doing Government work:

I believe that the principal navy-yards of the United States are capable to-day of beginning the construction of a modern vessel and carrying it on successfully.

Mr. DAYTON. Without detriment to the repair work?

Mr. BOWLES. Not only without detriment, but with great advantage to the repair work.

In answer to the question as to whether by the building of vessels in navy-yards the number of officers on shore duty would not be increased, Mr. Bowles said:

There are more people inspecting the ships building at Newport News than it would take to build the same number of ships in the New York Navy-Yard to day.

Mr. Baxter, the constructor at the Boston Navy-Yard, a man who in my judgment is one of the foremost men in the world in his line of business, summed up the matter admirably when he gave his opinion on this question in the following language:

Mr. BAXTER. When I went to the Mare Island Navy-Yard, nearly six years ago now, to take charge of the work, there was a bare, empty hull there. It is now the monitor Monadnock, which has made considerable fame for herself by her trip to Manila. We started in there with practically nothing. With the exception of this empty hull, everything had to be done at the Mare Island yard. That enabled us to get a plant together and to train the men. Then we went along. Congress in its wisdom ordered the rebuilding of the Hartford. That went along from year to year. Then there were two tugs built on special appropriations, and each one of these is an absolutely separate, definite appropriation, so I could use my best judgment.

If the current yearly appropriations were running slack, or if there were no ships to be repaired at the yard, I would switch my men off from one thing to another and keep my good men all the time. The result was, when the Spanish war came on us we did a great deal out there, although you did not hear about it in the East. I had at hand there a set of men that knew everything about the plant, and those men worked faithfully fourteen hours a day straight ahead for four or five months. That state of affairs could not have existed, in my opinion, if there had not been this jumping back and forth, if I had not had this continuous work to keep those people going, and the value to the Government of being able to do that work was quickly seen when the war came upon us, because we are very isolated out there in a great many ways, and we can not get men from Baltimore or New York or Philadelphia. We have to take the men we have, and those men have to be trained up to do what we want them to do, and if they can not get work in California they have to come back here; they can not stay there; and the cost of work on the construction work pure and simple was paid for ten times over by the efficiency with which the work for the Spanish war was rendered.

In another portion of his testimony he made the following statement:

Mr. BAXTER. Yes, sir. For instance, in repairs to a ship there are a great many different trades required. It might possibly be that we would be simply repairing—say, the woodwork of the deck or something of that kind—that would be the general line of the work, and therefore most of the men would be that style of mechanics. They would not be ship fitters or iron workers. In case another ship needed to be repaired—a ship that has been in collision, perhaps, and had a hole stove in her—a different set of men would be required, and none of those people working on the first ship mentioned would be needed. Whereas if you are building a ship you have those people there all the time, and it is simply taking a man out of this work and putting him into some other work.

Naval Constructor Stahl, of the Norfolk Navy-Yard, gave equally strong testimony in favor of this Government building one or more of the new vessels in the Government yards, and stated that the work could be done after a little while better and more economically than in the private yards.

Admiral Hichborn, the chief constructor of our Navy, who is recognized throughout the known world as one of the greatest authorities on shipbuilding, in his annual reports has favored this method of constructing war vessels.

Let us see what the practice of foreign governments is in this direction, and I will quote the figures for the year 1899. Before doing this, however, I will give the status of the different navies compiled up to and including 1898:

These figures conclusively show that other governments have found it profitable to build a portion of their war fleet in their own yards, and I can not see any reason why this House should fail to go on record in favor of making this innovation at the present time.

In order that the members of this House may realize the vast expenses that the Government is assuming in connection with the upbuilding of our Navy, and in order to draw the attention of the House to the vast payments that are being made for public works in the navy-yards where vessels are to be repaired, not constructed, I quote the following statements from the Naval Affairs Committee report of the present year:

The necessity for increased appropriations in this important branch of the naval establishment has been set forth in the able report of the Secretary of the Navy, on page 41, in which he says:

"The operations of the various bureaus at the yards during the war show that in very many respects the public works were not adequately equipped for the prompt and proper conduct of the work of repairing and fitting out vessels of war. Even in such navy-yards as New York, Norfolk, and Mare Island, the best equipped in the country, many deficiencies were found to exist. This was the experience of every bureau, and the importance of modernizing the navy-yard plants, erecting new storehouses and shops, providing adequate docking facilities, and thereby enabling the yards to meet the great increased requirements of the Navy was strongly impressed upon the Department."

The following table shows the value of the real estate, chattels, and machinery plants at the varicus yards and stations June 30, 1899:

The above indicates the magnitude of these yards and stations. It is here that the ships are taken for repair and fully equipped for further service, and as the number of ships increases a corresponding improvement in our yards and stations follows as a necessary sequence in order that they may be able to meet the requirements of a growing navy. The two must go hand in hand. While the committee has not seen fit to recommend what has been asked for to the full extent, yet they have made provision for that amount of public works which can be judiciously carried on during the coming fiscal year. Under the head of public works is that of the completion of the dry docks which are now being built at Portsmouth, Boston, League Island, Mare Island, and the floating dock at Algiers, La., requiring an appropriation of $1,550,000. There has already been appropriated for these docks $1,800,000, making a total of $3,250,000, and $1,800,000 more will be required to complete them.

This bill also provides for the beginning of construction of two more stone dry docks, one at New York and the other at Norfolk, Va. These are urgently demanded by the Department in view of the importance of these two yards, that of New York being the largest and most important and that of Norfolk next. At the present time we have no docks at either place large enough to take in our largest battle ships with safety.

Let us consider for a moment, Mr. Chairman, the false economy we are practicing when the Government, with navy-yard property to the value of $65,000,000, refuses to build part of its own fleet in these yards.

Statistics are available which prove that in the matter of the construction of battle ships and some other kinds of government vessels the work is done more cheaply at the government yards in England than in the private yards. In France the case is about the same. When one considers that there is no charge against the Government for taxes, for interest, for insurance, for plant depreciation in the building of vessels in the navy-yards, and no profits expected, it is simply incomprehensible to me, under the excellent system of labor employment now in vogue in the navy-yards of the country, that the work of building vessels can not be done more cheaply there than in private yards.

The Charlestown Navy-Yard for years, in its equipment department, has been manufacturing the cordage for the Navy, both hemp and wire, and it has held its own with private corporations. The smaller boats of the Navy are being built now at this yard, and the price compares favorably with that demanded by outside contractors.

The navy-yard at Charlestown is unequaled in the matter of water and rail transportation. Boston Harbor, where the yard is located, is one of the best, if not the best, harbor on the Atlantic Ocean. It has a magnificent system of fortifications, and, being the wealthiest and most populous city in New England, the National Government can always be depended upon to furnish proper protection to the port and therefore to the navy-yard. The harbor is accessible at all stages of the tide to Government vessels of the heaviest draft. Skilled labor in iron-ship building and marine engineering is to be found in ample supply, and if, therefore, a selection is to be made among the different navy-yards for the initiation of this work, the advantages of the Charlestown Navy-Yard must not be overlooked.

The maintenance of our naval establishments in proper manner is the best guaranty we have for peace. Two ends are accomplished by this practice.

First and most important is the preservation of peace without the sacrifice of honor and principle, and the second is that we may be prepared for war. Our ability to attain the first end is in proportion to our readiness to maintain our rights; hence it is necessary that we should at all times be independent of private shipbuilding establishments in the matter of ship construction. This work can not be carried forward any too soon.

We should have a settled policy. It will be wise economy to authorize the building of one or more ships in every navy-yard. There will be no pulling and hauling then for different appropriations for different classes of work at different navy-yards. All yards will be fitted up with the most modern tools and appliances, a system of construction and repair will be inaugurated in all of them, thousands of mechanics will be employed with living hours and living wages, and the Government will have embarked on a career of profound wisdom and economy in the building of its war ships. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw his amendment and allow another to be offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw the amendment which I have presented, so that the point of order may not be made against it now, my object being that another amendment may be presented upon another portion of the bill for the construction of some of the protected cruisers at the Government navy-yards.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment proposed by Mr. CUMMINGS, of New York, by adding thereto the following: "Provided further, That two of such gunboats shall be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or in the waters connected therewith."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOSS. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] to have been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been withdrawn for the present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gunboats provided for here are to be constructed at all, it seems to me that they should be constructed in as many different yards as possible, not only giving encouragement to the development of the yards themselves, throughout the country, but also allowing these boats, when constructed, to be in a position where they are most likely to be needed. Many of these vessels would probably be needed in the Philippine Islands, and the nearest point to the Philippines where we could build them is on the Pacific coast; and if constructed there, we would save considerable expense in taking them around for service in the Philippines.

Furthermore, we have about three yards on the Pacific coast that are able to construct naval ships of the various kinds, and the finest vessel we have in the Navy to-day, the Oregon, was constructed at San Francisco, as well as several torpedo boats, while others have been constructed, one at Seattle and one at Portland, Oreg. Under the amendment of the gentleman from New York all of these must be constructed, or all of these may be constructed at least, in one yard if the bids are low enough, unless we adopt a provision of this kind.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Oh, no; it provides that not more than two shall be constructed in one yard.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then in three yards you would be able to construct the whole of them on the Atlantic coast. In other words, three yards will alone be available for the construction of them if the amendment is adopted, and it seems to me that anything that tends to encourage the building up of the yards all over the country, diversifying the construction of our vessels and adding new facilities to such construction, is a great benefit to the people at large, and hence I ask the adoption of the amendment that I have proposed.

A MEMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the gunboats are provided for, that two of them shall be constructed in the waters of the Pacific coast.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do you limit the extra cost of the two which you propose to construct there?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not done so in this amendment——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Because if these vessels were required to be constructed on that coast, and no limit as to cost were made, there is no knowing how much the Government might have to pay.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But there will be at least three competitors for their construction.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Do you not think it better to ask that the amendment be withdrawn and the question of competitive construction be determined hereafter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am entirely willing that the competition be extended to the shipyards on our coast.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Because your amendment applies to the gunboats, and not only to the gunboats but to the cruisers and battle ships as well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. You have provided already that two of the cruisers and battle ships may be constructed on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean under a differential of 4 per cent.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. But it provides that the cost shall not exceed 4 per cent above the lowest bids for vessels provided for in this act.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but if the amendment of the gentleman from New York should prevail, only two vessels would be constructed, and these two might be gunboats, while all of the battle ships and cruisers might be constructed on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The amendment of the gentleman from New York is a provision made after the word "each," in line 4, as the gentleman will find, and adds a proviso according to which two of these vessels may be constructed on the Pacific coast if the bids are satisfactory. That will apply to the gunboats, if they are put in, as well as to the battle ships. So the amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but it will not provide for the building of two gunboats as well as two of the other ships.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes; there is no limit as to the number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Only two are to be constructed on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Not more than two in one yard.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The gentleman will see that, beginning in line 15, it says:

And subject to the provisions hereinafter made two and not more than two of the aforesaid vessels shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, or in the waters connecting therewith.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I beg your pardon. That is correct. I was mistaken.

Mr. DAYTON. I suggest that the gentleman withdraw his amendment, and if the gunboats are provided for then line 16 can be amended so as to provide that two of the battle ships and two of the gunboats may be constructed on the Pacific coast. That will accomplish what the gentleman desires.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. DAYTON. I suggest that as the better thing to do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That would be all right. I withdraw my amendment, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that I may reach the subject in the other way.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the proposition which is pending before the House is the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for 6 gunboats.

In the Secretary's report to Congress this year he recommended a naval programme consisting of 3 armored cruisers, 3 protected cruisers, and 12 gunboats; but when we had the Secretary before the committee, Admiral Dewey being there at the same time, it was discovered that General Otis had purchased, I think, 14 gunboats of just about the size which the Secretary had recommended in his report; and not only that, but we had raised 3 of the Spanish gunboats and added those to the Navy, making in all 17 gunboats; and it was decided by the committee that it would be wise to leave out the gunboats this year, in consequence of that fact, and in their place to build 2 battle ships. That seemed to meet with the approval of the Admiral and the Secretary of the Navy at that time, and that is the recommendation of the committee in this bill.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, there is no proposition in this whole bill which I more heartily support than I do the proposition contained in the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. These gunboats are of the most useful type of boat in the United States Navy. We have but 6 of them in the entire Navy to-day.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And they are all at Manila, too.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Yes. I find on examination of the roster of the English navy that Great Britain has two and a half of these boats for every battle ship in the English navy. These boats will pay for themselves in two years' time in the saving of maintenance and cost of the larger vessels, which have to be used if they are not constructed.

They are useful for a great many purposes, for ordinary cruising and for patrol duty, and their complement is comparatively small. If we had had them during the Spanish war in cruising the waters of the West Indies, we should have saved hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars. The boats purchased by General Otis in the Philippine Islands are of exceedingly light draft and entirely unseaworthy. Not one of those would have been obtainable by the United States if they could have crossed the ocean. They are good for nothing except the navigation of the quiet waters surrounding those islands, and are of comparatively little use for the general purposes of the United States Navy. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will be adopted by the unanimous voice of the committee.

Mr. FOSS. I call for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. CUMMINGS) there were—ayes 28, noes 52.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, 19 members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand therefor.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

After the word "Provided," in line 2, page 64, insert:

"That the contracts for the construction of the said battle ships and of each class of cruisers shall contain provisions to the effect that the contractors guarantee that when completed and tested for speed under conditions to be prescribed by the Navy Department the battle ships shall exhibit a speed of at least 19 knots an hour under natural draft and that the cruisers of both classes shall exhibit a speed of at least 23 knots an hour under natural draft. And of the two battle ships hereby authorized to be constructed the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to pay to the contractor of the one that shall develop the greatest speed the sum of $50,000 for every one-half knot in excess of the speed of the other.

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to pay to the contractor for the building of any cruiser in each class authorized to be built by this act that shall exhibit a speed greater than either of the other two in the same class the sum of $50,000 for every one-fourth knot in excess of the greatest speed exhibited by either of the other two in the same class."

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt that it is new legislation, and accordingly sustains the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, on page 62, line 10, the word "two" and insert the word "one;" strike out, in line 16, the word "three" and insert instead the word "two;" strike out, in line 22, the word "three" and insert the word "two."

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to offer an amendment to that amendment, beginning at the word "two," in line 10, striking out lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and down to the word "three," in line 16, and that will leave his amendment applying to just the two battle ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. My amendment is to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that his amendment shall read as follows: Strike out on page 62, beginning at the word "two," in line 10, and then lines 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and down to the word "three," in line 16, and the effect of that will be to strike out only after the two battle ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first report the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "contract," in line 10, page 62, down to and including the word "each," in line 16 of the same page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania changes the original text, and therefore will first be in order, because it will be an amendment to the original text.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to interfere with the committee's bill. We have three ships now on the docks, and they have been waiting for armor for a considerable length of time, and through the action of this Congress, if this bill is passed, allowing $545 a ton—and it can not be had for less—will result in a net loss to this Government of nearly $400,000, and the contractors and owners of these shipyards who have them in their docks will be found in the Court of Claims, and properly there, claiming heavy damages for delay in the finishing of these ships. If I understand correctly, the other day we were short in naval officers—and I want to be corrected if I am wrong—some 1,400 officers. We have not the men to man the ships that we have, and this bill makes no provision to provide for the officers and the men for the great ships that we have already built, and the Secretary of the Navy was compelled for lack of men to take them out of service and to put them in your League Island anchorage or some other place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we build, according to my amendment, 1 battle ship, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 protected cruisers, we would have appropriated, if this bill passes, $17,700,000, and if this amendment of mine prevails and is adopted by the House, we will reduce this bill $10,680,000. I am satisfied from the condition——

Mr. FOSS. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him a moment, he does not mean that we will reduce this bill $10,000,000, because the gentleman must know that if these ships are authorized it takes about a year to thrash out the plans before the ships can be put under contract.

Mr. MAHON. We had better not thrash out too much.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We must get the thing in shape to thrash first.

Mr. MAHON. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that 1 battle ship and 4 cruisers are sufficient for each Congress to provide for. Now, you see how much this bill will carry over, from $58,000,000 to $61,000,000; and when you count the cost of these ships, I believe this House ought to make this reduction. It is a reasonable reduction, and 1 battle ship, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 protected cruisers will be provided for.

Another thing, Mr. Chairman: The material and labor have gone away up to about double the price; and if you go on and put these vessels under contract, there is no telling what the Government will have to pay for them with the prices of iron as high as they are at present. Now, the question is, Do we need them? The Navy is not provided with a sufficient number of officers and men for the ships already in the service and going into the service. I believe there are some five or six battle ships and cruisers that will be ready for the service that have never been in it before, and therefore I ask the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am sure he does not voice the sentiment either of Congress or of the people of this country. I am of the opinion that they are almost a unit in their desire to increase the efficiency of our Navy. All the maritime powers of the world are increasing in all directions, and it has been but a short time since we were called upon in this Hall to vote an emergency fund of $50,000,000 to make more efficient our Navy.

I do not believe that the American Congress or the American people want to repeat that action. These vessels, if authorized in this bill, can not be contracted for at this time. The plans for them must be prepared, and it will take from six to nine months for the Department to prepare these plans; and if we delay action in this matter of authorization, we must certainly delay the ultimate finishing of these vessels, and we must also delay having them as vessels of war to defend us.

I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that this House and this country will approve of the action of the committee in regard to the increase of the Navy, and I sincerely hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not prevail, but that the action of this Congress at this session and at all future sessions will be to gradually build up the Navy each and every year, so that at all times we may have in our squadron the highest efficiency that man can produce.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Yes.

Mr. WACHTER. How long will it take to build a ship after the plan has been made?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Three or four years.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on the amendment I offered, to strike out the two battle ships, which is pending and is to come up later for a vote. I believe it will meet the desires of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have no doubt that he has already read the reports, and after thoroughly hearing the facts we hope he will be with us on this matter. The minority report says nothing about these battle ships. One member of the minority favors this section as it stands, as we understand. The others agree that the two battle ships ought to be omitted.

Another thing I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to, and the attention of the committee, is that when the Secretary of the Navy made his annual report, as the gentleman from New Jersey knows, he did not recommend the building of any battle ships, but he recommended the building of 3 armored cruisers and 3 protected cruisers, for which this bill provides.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KITCHIN. You may.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Did not the Secretary of the Navy in his testimony before the committee say that he desired the battle ships, and did he not give a reason for omitting them in his report?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will read it, and I think the reasons he gave are the strongest reasons in the world why we should stand by his first report. He said that the board had thought about recommending more than they did recommend—that is, the 6 cruisers—and that there were 3 battle ships considered, but they were omitted for fear they were asking too much. In view of the fact that there are 3 battle ships authorized and not begun, and this, too, is well known to the gentleman from New Jersey, that we have 3 battle ships authorized for which no contract has been made, the Secretary of the Navy himself, knowing the extravagance of this Congress, said the reason he did not recommend some battle ships was because he thought it would be asking too much and he could not get it.

Now, on page 9, the Secretary said this, in response to a question by Mr. RIXEY:

> Mr. RIXEY. You would utilize those 3 gunboats?
> Secretary LONG. I should be glad to. You gentlemen must bear in mind in making the recommendation, it never occurred to me that Congress would give us 3 battle ships, costing three millions or four millions apiece, and also 3 cruisers, costing a great deal of money, and 3 protected cruisers of 8,000 tons, also costing a great deal.

And, then, Secretary Long, lower down on the same page, says:

> I think you will come to it, of course, in future years.

And he reiterates it that he had no idea that this Congress would give him, in addition to the 6 cruisers, 3 battle ships.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And no gunboats.

Mr. KITCHIN. He did recommend 12 gunboats. Secretary Long, as I understand, never insisted upon it. Admiral Dewey, who was examined on the same day, as I recollect his testimony, said that he preferred armored cruisers to any other class of ships, and he agreed with Secretary Long about the immense naval programme involved in this bill.

Now, let me say this: I called attention the other day, when the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and the distinguished acting chairman of the committee [Mr. FOSS] were flaunting in our faces the great German programme, I called attention to the fact that if we only adopted the German programme we would have to cut our number of proposed war vessels in two, because in sixteen years the German navy will add 422,000 tons to their navy, while at the rate of increase last year and this year we shall add more than 1,400,000 to our Navy in that time. I believe in increasing our Navy, but I believe we should increase it gradually. I believe in putting the best ship to sea whenever one goes to sea, but I believe it is absolutely unnecessary to increase the Navy at the rate of 90,000 tons a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. The tonnage in last year's bill was 91,000 tons, according to my calculation, and I went over it very carefully. The tonnage in this bill is 88,000 tons. Now, if we keep up this rate for sixteen years we shall have a Navy not only equal to Germany, but double that of Germany at that time and equal to that of England now. I will now hear what the gentleman from New Jersey has to ask.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I know the gentleman desires to state the facts in the case.

Mr. KITCHIN. I certainly do.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to Secretary Long's statement, on page 4, in answer to the gentleman's position when he says it was never the intention of the Secretary to build battle ships. In reply to a question by Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky, the Secretary says that it was his original idea to build three battle ships.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. And below that, on the same page, in Admiral Dewey's testimony, the Secretary says he would be very glad if we gave them the battle ships and the cruisers.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have stated nothing contrary to that. I quoted the Admiral's testimony, and stated that the Secretary of the Navy said that he wanted to ask the committee for the battle ships, but he did not do so because he thought that Congress would not authorize them.

Now, let me call attention to the fact that the construction of the battle ships and other ships authorized in this bill will impose upon the United States an obligation of about $50,000,000—$28,000,000 for hulls and machinery; and I estimate it will take at least twenty or twenty-five million dollars to supply the armor, the furniture, and the ordnance, etc. The vessels authorized in the bill of last year, in my opinion, imposed upon the Government an obligation to the amount of forty-five or fifty million dollars.

Sixty-two million dollars of the obligations authorized for ships heretofore have not yet been appropriated, as I understand, but must hereafter be paid by the Government. To-day we have, including the obligations carried by this bill, more than $100,000,000 of obligations imposed upon the United States, none of which is provided for in this bill, but all of which must be met hereafter for naval purposes.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Will it not be ten years before all that money will be required to be expended?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is perhaps true, but what I am objecting to is adding to our obligations at the rate of $50,000,000 a year for the next ten years, making an additional $500,000,000 for the Navy in that time. I am in favor of standing by the recommendations of the Secretary of the Navy and allowing the provision for these six cruisers to stay in this bill; but I think we ought to strike out the provision for the battle ships and proceed to build up our Navy gradually. There is no use of incurring a debt of fifty, sixty, or seventy-five million dollars a year for ships in the building up of this Navy.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman believe in that policy because this Government can not afford to buy battle ships?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, sir. But because this Government can if it chooses tax the people to death, that is no reason why we should do so.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Does the gentleman believe that it is not necessary to enlarge our Navy, because the German Government is not making similar progress?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman had been here the other day he would know that that was one of the strongest arguments in the speeches made here at that time for an increase in our Navy.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It did not appeal to me in that way. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] to make the comparison for the purpose of strengthening the American Navy and not to limit it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to speak in praise of the great German programme, and I have shown that the last two bills of this House indicate three times the increase that Germany proposes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Your argument has no force with me. We are a greater nation than Germany, and should have a Navy large enough to meet all emergencies.

Mr. KITCHIN. No matter about that; I take the position that to-day we have a navy larger than that of Germany, and we have not the same necessity for a vast navy that Germany has. I also believe we should have a navy sufficient to meet emergencies, and say that we have one that has so far successfully met them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Our Navy is none too large for the United States now, and it takes time to build the new ships, and they should be authorized each year, thus building up the Navy steadily and strongly.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman must have heard me say not more than two or three minutes ago that I was in favor of increasing our Navy, but not at the exorbitant rate that this bill indicates.

As for the position of Germany, she stands in the midst of other powerful nations surrounding her, Italy, Russia, her old enemy, France, and England. Nations so situated, with various colonial possessions throughout the world, require larger navies than the United States. I admit that this Government having, under the present Administration, entered upon a policy of imperialism, will need a larger navy than it would have needed otherwise. This requires an increase of the Navy, although I am not in favor of imperialism or colonialism, and I do not favor such enormous strides annually in authorizing war vessels and entailing such heavy expenditures as this naval increase represents, because I do not believe there is any necessity for it.

Mr. Chairman, we do not need a navy such as Italy, Germany, and such other nations need which stand side by side, with hundreds of thousands of men in arms in time of peace, always expecting war and always standing with swords drawn against their neighbors.

I therefore think we ought to strike out the two battle ships, but leave the cruisers in the bill, thus following the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy in his report.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, just a word in this connection. This bill provides for two battle ships. When we had our war with Spain we traveled all over the world trying to buy a battle ship and could not purchase one. It is absolutely impossible to obtain by purchase that class of ships, and it is the bulwark of our defense in a naval conflict.

What is the condition of our Navy to-day?

We have and will have only sixteen when all authorized are provided for, or, rather, when all are completed. England has seventy. The Committee on Naval Affairs has year after year gradually added to this class of ships—the most important, the one that constitutes the fighting line—and they have been gradually added to, as I have said, by the committee.

Now, I submit to the judgment of the House on both sides that it is reasonable and right for us to carry out the programme that has been carried on with unanimity for years past by adding two or three battle ships each year until our Navy is commensurate with our importance and requirements.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon this part of the bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I want five minutes, if the gentleman would allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. RIXEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not close the debate now. I have stated, if my colleague will permit me, that I desired five minutes at least.

Mr. FOSS. Then I move that debate be closed at the end of ten minutes.

Mr. RIXEY. If the gentleman will pardon me, he will remember the other day that it was generally understood and, I think, agreed upon that when we came to this part of the bill general discussion should be had for at least sixty minutes on a side if it was desired.

Mr. FOSS. There was no understanding or agreement, if the gentleman will remember. Objection was made.

Mr. RIXEY. That is true, but it was the general talk that such would be allowed.

Mr. FOSS. The general talk was that when we came to that part of the bill which provided for the building of the navy-yards the debate might run for a reasonable time.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order, Mr. Chairman!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for, which is the vote on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. RIXEY. I understood the motion was to close debate in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. But the regular order was demanded, and that is the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that a motion would now be in order to strike out the last word.

Mr. RIXEY. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with much that was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to the propriety of reducing the number of vessels authorized, and was glad that the motion to reduce the number of ships authorized by the bill came from that side of the House.

So far as I am concerned, sir, I shall vote every dollar that seems necessary to provide a good Navy; but it does seem to me, in matters of this kind, if we follow the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy it would be sufficient, and we ought not to be expected to go beyond that. The consideration of this matter is largely intrusted to him, and if we follow his recommendation it is sufficient.

In the last bill we authorized the construction of three battle ships and three armored cruisers, which are battle ships in everything except name, none of which have as yet been contracted for. Six battle ships, therefore, have been authorized, but no contract has yet been made for their construction. Admiral O'Neil tells us that it will be six or eight months before the contract is made for them. In view of this condition why should we authorize two more battle ships, when the Secretary of the Navy does not ask for them?

Secretary Long, in his testimony or statement before the committee in response to a question of the utilization of certain gunboats, said:

> You gentlemen must bear in mind in making the recommendation it never occurred to me that Congress would give us three battle ships, costing $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 apiece, and also three cruisers, costing a great deal of money, and three protected cruisers of 8,000 tons, also costing a great deal.
> Mr. DAYTON. Looking at the world's naval progress and advance in the face, I want you to state whether you regard an increase of three battle ships and three cruisers as an unwarrantable one?
> Secretary LONG. Not at all. I think you will come to it, of course, in future years. If I were on the Naval Committee I should be inclined to say that with three battle ships already authorized and construction not yet begun, if you will give us three big cruisers and three smaller cruisers we will have enough large ships to go to the country with this present year.

I say, therefore, that this proposition to build two battle ships is not in pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy; and it seems to me that with six battle ships already authorized, but not contracted for, we have enough to wait until the assembling of Congress in December. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to strike out the two battle ships should prevail.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, one of the first votes which I cast in Congress after I became a member of it, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, was a vote for four new battle ships. I think, however we have now arrived at a stage in our history when, for a while at least, we ought to call a halt, until we can see our way clear to have officers enough to man those we already have in commission and expect soon to have in commission. Ships should not be built just to spend the people's money nor to aid in making us appear as a "world power" among the nations of the earth.

Mr. DAYTON. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that by this bill and the provisions that have already been passed we have provided for the extra officers.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Secretary of the Navy, in Senate Document 168, this session, in reporting to the Senate upon the resolution of inquiry relative to what ships are in commission, or soon would be, and the number of men necessary to officer them, has reported the number of vessels in commission, or which soon will be, and the number of officers required, and has stated that 867 officers will be needed on additional ships under construction and under repair. Experience in the late war has demonstrated that the cruiser, with her 8-inch guns, is more effective than the large battle ship, with her 13-inch guns. The battles of Manila and Santiago Bay were won by the cruisers and the 8-inch guns.

Now, we propose to go on with this bill, the largest naval appropriation bill that we have ever had in the history of this country, in a time of profound peace—and it is even suggested in the report of the majority that it is almost equal to disloyalty to oppose some of the provisions of this bill—and spend $28,000,000 for new ships, exclusive of armor and armament.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I am ready, whenever this country needs battle ships or needs men in time of war, to give them to the utmost limit of our Treasury and to the furthest limits of taxation; but in the past few years we have progressed, from being the fifteenth nation in the world in sea power to where we stand, fourth, and are able to compete with the other nations of the world certainly in the management of our Navy, in the defense of our own coasts and our own commerce. Therefore I see nothing in the necessities pressing upon this country to demand such an extravagant expenditure of money in increasing the Navy by two battle ships, and these three additional armored cruisers, and the protected cruisers provided for in this bill.

am ready at all times to vote money to sustain it, but I say this increase of two battle ships, three armored cruisers, and four protected cruisers provided for in this bill is unnecessary at this time. Why should we go on increasing our Navy to such an extent? Are we at war or in prospect of war with anyone? Is it expected that in the near future it will be necessary for us to parade our Navy or our Army in order to incite war? I remember, Mr. Chairman, when it was announced two years ago that Russia had appropriated $70,000,000 to increase her navy, it startled the world, and we all looked upon it as an evidence of the fact that she was preparing herself for an aggressive and an offensive war with her enemies, the other great powers of the earth.

To-day we, who are a people of peace, who have builded this Republic upon the theories and principles of the founders of it, who proposed to establish for all time to come a republican government which should not interfere with the affairs of foreign nations by carrying offensive war into other climes and lands, but to protect our own people and our own coasts; we, a peace-loving people, who have established liberty upon this continent, and who expect all the peoples of the world to look to us as lovers of liberty in a republic to live forever and for aye, are appropriating nearly $70,000,000 to increase our Navy, that we may attract attention as a warlike people, and vie with the other powers of the earth in extravagant expenditures for our military and naval establishments. For one, in the behalf of the taxpayers, I protest, and shall vote to strike out the provision for new battle ships.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote upon the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman form North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. FOSS. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 62 strike out all after the word "contract," in line 10, down to and including the word "each," in line 16, the part proposed to be stricken out being the following:

"Two seagoing battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, upon a trial displacement of about 13,500 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $3,600,000 each."

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 50, noes 68.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I offer the following amendment,

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting before the word "three," in line 22, page 62, the following:

"To be constructed under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Navy in such of the navy-yards of the United States as are best adapted therefor."

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, very clear that the point of order does not lie. This is a paragraph authorizing the increase of the Navy, and by providing that the vessels shall be built by contract it places a limitation upon the power of the President. This amendment is merely a further limitation on his power or discretion in regard to the construction of certain vessels. It does not change existing law. There is no existing law authorizing the building of these vessels. This bill authorizes the construction of certain vessels, and this amendment proposes the manner in which some of them shall be built.

If the bill merely provided that the President of the United States shall have constructed certain vessels, it would be in order to limit his power and discretion by providing that he must build them by contract, as it is in fact done; and it is equally in order to further limit his discretion by providing that a certain number of these vessels shall be constructed in some other way than by contract. It is proper to provide some other method or means or place where these vessels authorized by the bill shall be constructed. I think it is very clear that the amendment is in order and not obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I beg to state that there is a special act under which ships authorized by each naval appropriation bill, year by year, are contracted for. That act was passed in 1886. Under that act there were some vessels authorized. Section 5 of that act states—

That the Secretary of the Navy shall cause one or more of the new vessels herein provided for to be constructed, by one or more contractors, to be completed in one or more of the navy-yards of the United States, and if he shall be unable to contract with responsible parties—

This is the language which I especially call to the attention of the Chair—

And if he shall be unable to contract with responsible parties to construct and build at reasonable prices all or any of the vessels hereinbefore provided for, he shall cause the same to be constructed or completed in such of the navy-yards of the United States as may be best adapted thereto.

Under this particular act of 1886 it is discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy, in case he should be unable to contract for vessels at reasonable prices, to have them built in the navy-yards of the United States, at such navy-yards as he may designate.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FOSS. I do not care to be interrupted when discussing a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. The gentleman has not stated the facts there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to connect this bill with the law of 1886. On line 9, page 63, are these words:

And in the construction of all said vessels all the provisions of the act of March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," shall be observed and followed.

Now, that refers to the naval bill, the naval appropriation act of last year. In the naval appropriation act of last year—that is, for the construction of the vessels authorized last year—"all of the provisions of the act of May 4, 1898, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes,' shall be observed and followed." That is the act of last year, which refers back to the previous year. In each substantially the same language is used, relating back to the act of the year previous to that. Now, what do we find in the act of March 3, 1897, which was passed March 3, 1897, but to which this act related back from other acts?

And in the construction of said torpedo boats all the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886—

The act, the special act, which to-day is in operation and under which all vessels are built, the section which I read but a few moments ago:

And in the construction of said torpedo boats all the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to materials for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, except as to premiums, which are not to be offered, the notice of proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, and specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts, shall be observed and followed, and said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic manufacture.

That act, Mr. Chairman, refers back to the special and specific act of 1886, which is the permanent law to-day on the subject of contracting for the construction of these naval vessels. That act, which is the permanent law to-day, leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, in case he should not be able to contract for these ships at a reasonable price, to build them in the navy-yards of our country. But, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from New York makes it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy to build these ships in the Government navy-yards, and because that amendment is mandatory, and because the permanent act itself is discretionary, therefore the point of order, in my judgment, should be sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] has hardly stated the facts correctly in connection with the act of August 3, 1886. If the amendment be not in order, it must be obnoxious to the rule legislating or making a change in existing law upon appropriation bills. The act of August 3, 1886, was an act providing for the building or construction of certain vessels named therein. In that act there was a provision, inserted in the House, providing that certain vessels should be built in the navy-yard and that other vessels should be built by contract, and that those to be built by contract should be built in the navy-yard if favorable contracts could not be made. That act was a law unto itself; it only applied to the vessels that were provided for in that bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. An appropriation bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. No; it was not an appropriation bill. The point was made in the House by Mr. Reed, of Maine, and Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, that the proper place to provide for the construction of vessels was in the naval appropriation bill. This was a law to construct certain vessels, and it provided in that law for the method of constructing them.

The appropriation bill for this year provides, under the head of "Increase of the Navy," that the President of the United States "shall have constructed by contract" certain vessels; and if this House has the power to limit the construction of vessels by contract, it has the further power to limit the discretion and to provide for the construction of some of them in some other way. It could bring in a bill authorizing the building of vessels alone by the President of the United States, and then he could build them anywhere he liked. It does not do that. It limits his power to build them to contract, and this amendment further limits that power.

There is no existing law which says that every vessel or new ship to be built shall be built by contract. The act of 1886 merely provides that the vessels mentioned in that act shall be built in a certain way, and it does not seem possible to construe that law as to affect any other authorization for an increase of the Navy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] has not even stated the ground upon which he believes this amendment to be out of order; he has not stated upon which clause of the rule he hangs his objection. He has made a statement about the act of 1886, which merely authorizes certain vessels and provides for the methods and the places in which they should be constructed. It can not affect the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the argument that was made to the Chair the other day on the "emergency fund" would seem to imply that the point of order in this case would not be sustained; and for this reason I understood it was argued, and met the Chair's approval, that the "emergency fund" was for the maintenance of the Navy, and if enacted for the benefit of the naval establishment then, under several decisions heretofore made on appropriation bills, it would be in order on this bill. I believe the Chairman himself cited instances where they had put new ships upon appropriation bills because it was to maintain the Navy.

Now, what is the purpose of this amendment? In the opinion of those who introduced it, it is for the benefit of the Navy. I take it this is true: That if the Naval Committee had inserted this provision in the bill, and a point of order had been raised against it, and the point of order could not have been sustained, then the point of order can not now lie against this amendment when offered to this bill. If that is true, if you could not strike this provision from the bill on account of its being a change of law, then certainly the amendment itself, when proposed to be put on the bill, could not be resisted on the ground that it is a change of law.

For instance, we put on certain ships here and we insert the words "by contract." The Chair would have no hesitation in holding the words "by contract" were for the purposes of maintaining the Navy, and, following the ruling of the other day, the Chair would hold that the point of order against the words "by contract" could not be sustained.

If the words "by contract" could remain in the bill against the point of order, certainly a provision saying that three ships shall be built in the navy-yards would remain in the bill. If the committee would have the right in the first instance of putting in this bill that three ships were to be built in three different navy-yards, then you can find no precedent for throwing out this amendment on a point of order?

As I said, if it would be sustained if it were now in the bill against a point of order, it certainly should not be rejected, when being offered as an amendment, on the same point of order.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to be heard one moment on the point of order. I would like to ask the Chair to take into consideration the fact that the act of 1886, which provided for an increase of the Navy, was not in the regular appropriation bill. I have read the debate most carefully. I have it before me in volume 81, records of Forty-ninth Congress, in the first session.

At the opening of the day's session Mr. Randall arose and demanded the regular order. There was considerable debate over it, and Mr. Herbert moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bill 6664, to increase the naval establishment. There was a great deal of debate over that bill.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Boutelle] made an exceedingly strong and partisan speech against the bill, in which he said the Naval Committee itself should have brought that in at the time they reported the naval bill. The gentleman from Maine also, Mr. Reed, as my colleague has stated, also made an exceedingly strong speech, parts of it in opposition to the policy of considering the increase of the Navy in that special bill, contending that it should have been done in the regular bill of the Naval Committee. The bill went along without debate as far as that was concerned, and no point of order was raised. I have looked up the records to ascertain when it was, and how it was, and why it was that the increase of the Navy was placed in the naval appropriation bill.

It was done two Congresses later in order that matters might be facilitated. I believe it was when the Republican party won control of this House. They brought in these appropriations. I can not find that there was any point of order raised upon the proposition for the increase of the Navy under Republican rule or by the minority at that time.

In the report upon that bill, Mr. Herbert, then chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, distinctly said:

> I read now another extract from the report, showing that as the responsibility is with the executive department, and as we desire to utilize all the mechanical genius of the country, we have given the Secretary a discretionary power over these contracts.

Now, in consideration of the fact that this was a separate bill at the time the increase in the Navy was started, I insist that the point of order can not hold good against the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I wish simply to call the attention of the Chair to a part of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy for this year. In his report, under the head "Increase of the Navy," I find this language, showing that there can be no existing law in regard to the building of vessels which gives him discretionary power:

> The same board are also of the opinion that if any of the foregoing vessels are authorized the law should provide that in case satisfactory bids can not be obtained for their construction by contract the Department shall have authority to construct the same in the navy-yards.

I submit that this language shows clearly that the Secretary of the Navy, under the law as it stands at present, has no discretionary power to build these vessels where he pleases, notwithstanding the contention of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears to the Chair that the natural interpretation of the language just read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fitzgerald] is that under the construction of the present law by the Secretary of the Navy there is no law for building any of these vessels in the navy-yards, but that legislation would be necessary in order to authorize that. This is the interpretation the Chair would put upon the language which the gentleman has just read.

Aside from that, however, the question now before the Committee of the Whole is whether this provision is new legislation or whether it is a limitation of the appropriation. There are several decisions to which the attention of the Chair has been called. One of them reads in this way:

> Provisions that bids for the construction of naval vessels should be limited to bidders having adequate plants and not having over a specified number of vessels under construction were held to be in the nature of legislation and not a limitation.

That decision would seem to throw a good deal of light upon the question of order on this amendment, which provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall construct these vessels "in such navy-yards of the United States as are at present established therefor." This would seem to be a parallel case. The Chair therefore, following the decision made in the Fifty-fifth Congress, sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee of the Whole?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 80, noes 58.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Foss and Mr. Fitzgerald of New York were appointed.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 74.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend by adding, after the word "each," in line 4, page 63, the following: "The three last-mentioned vessels to be constructed, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of the Navy, in such of the navy-yards of the United States as are best adapted therefor."

Mr. FOSS. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Construction and machinery: On account of the hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $12,740,669.

Mr. VANDIVER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After the word "dollars," at the end of line 6, page 64, insert the following: "That the sum of $2,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of suitable buildings and the purchase of suitable machinery and other materials necessary for the establishment and maintenance of a plant for furnishing armor plate for the use of the Navy.
> "Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to appoint a board to consist of three officers of the Navy, who shall examine and report what, in their opinion, is the most suitable site for the erection of the plant provided for in the foregoing section of this act; and no money shall be expended until the point so selected shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this proposition is not germane to the section, and also that it is new legislation.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if he will not consent to withhold the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that the proposition is not germane to the section and that it is new legislation.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman if by the latter part of the point of order he means us to understand also that he will make the point of order if the amendment is offered to the next paragraph?

Mr. DAYTON. Unquestionably.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then I ask the gentleman if he will not consent, in view of the understanding arrived at on Wednesday afternoon, to withhold the point of order until some discussion can be had upon this part of the bill, or upon the amendments, and that we may have some opportunity of presenting amendments to it? If I understand it, the chairman of the committee on Wednesday afternoon consented that when this paragraph should be reached in the discussion, under the five-minute rule, time would be allowed for the presentation of amendments then to be offered for debate and action upon them; and under that agreement I think the chairman of the committee has consented to allow the matter to be so discussed. I would like to ask, therefore, if the gentleman will not withhold the point of order for that purpose?

Mr. DAYTON. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is a misunderstanding as to having time for debate on the armor-plate question under the five-minute rule. There was an agreement, which was carried out, that there should be an hour's general debate on both sides touching the question of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. VANDIVER. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the other agreement was made at the same time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Whether the gentleman from West Virginia was present or not, it was consented to.

Mr. FOSS. There was no agreement.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But there was a tacit understanding to that effect.

Mr. FOSS. It was understood generally without any agreement that there should be some debate on this portion of the bill when the time came. The fact of the matter is, gentlemen, that we have exhausted now nearly five days in the discussion of this and other propositions connected with the naval appropriation.

Mr. VANDIVER. This proposition has received no attention under the opportunity to amend.

Mr. FOSS. And I am anxious that the bill should be reported out of the committee this evening.

Mr. VANDIVER. I should not undertake to obstruct that.

Mr. FOSS (continuing). Gentlemen know that to-morrow is set apart for eulogies, and I think we ought to be able to fully consider this proposition to-night and close the general debate in a very brief time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri what is the use of presenting an amendment that would be likely to be ruled out?

Mr. FOSS. How much time does the gentleman from Missouri want?

Mr. VANDIVER. For myself, only a short time. Of course, I can not speak for other gentlemen.

Mr. DAYTON. Will a half hour be enough? We will not want any time on this side, or very little.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, I am not prepared to say as to that.

Mr. DAYTON. Well, say twenty minutes on your side and ten on this.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. But what is the use of making a speech on an amendment in view of the remarkable ruling which we have just had?

Mr. VANDIVER. We have no intention on this side of trying to delay the passage of the bill. It would be fair and reasonable to consent to an hour or an hour and a half on this question.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman state how long he desires to debate the proposition, and we may be able to arrive at some conclusion?

Mr. VANDIVER. I have no disposition to unnecessarily delay the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAYTON. There is just an hour and ten minutes of the session left of to-day, and we want to get through with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, there is but one proposition after this likely to lead to any discussion.

Mr. DAYTON. Let us say, then, that we have twenty minutes on a side.

Mr. VANDIVER. Oh, that would be too short a time.

Mr. DAYTON. Then you can take thirty minutes on your side, and we have twenty on this.

Mr. VANDIVER. So far as I am personally concerned, I should not object. But other gentlemen may desire to be heard.

Mr. DAYTON. Then I reserve the point of order for fifty minutes, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that thirty minutes of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] and twenty minutes on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia reserves the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania renews it.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would not be willing for the chairman of the committee to arrive at some understanding?

Mr. MAHON. This question has been thrashed over and over again, and I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will not consent that the chairman of the committee may make arrangements by which the bill will be disposed of this afternoon?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, then, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MAHON. If we can take a vote on the bill at 5 o'clock, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. VANDIVER. I shall not undertake to prolong the debate beyond 5 o'clock.

Mr. MAHON. Well, make your agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say that any agreement of that kind on a proposition of this sort is absurd. I shall address myself to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss]. Here is a proposition which has involved the whole naval establishment of the United States for the last five years, which has delayed the construction of at least three battle ships, which are now unprovided with armor. It is a question to which this Congress has devoted hours in the past, and which very nearly defeated the last naval bill, because of inability to agree on the proposition in conference. And yet, with this most important item in the entire bill, the item that has brought about more discussion and more difficulty in the passage of the naval appropriation bill than any other item that we have had in it for five years, the gentleman comes before this House and says the House must decide this question without a reasonable discussion.

Now, to say that there shall be twenty minutes in which to discuss a question that involves the facts and figures that this does, and to say that it must be disposed of in twenty minutes, is practically the same as to say that the gentleman proposes to lead this House to the desk there like a bull with a ring in his nose and force the House to vote on party lines, without any due consideration of this great business question.

Mr. DAYTON. In view of that statement, I insist on the point of order now. I have tried to arrange it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is insisted upon, and the Chair is ready to decide.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman for ten minutes on the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to state that the Chair has no right to limit a member of this House in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that discussion on a point of order is entirely within the discretion of the Chair. The Chair may decide it without any discussion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason the Chair made the limitation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, in all good temper and in good faith, I wish to say this to the Chair: I desire to be heard on this point of order. I desire to be heard fully. I think that the importance of this matter entitles members on this side to be heard fully; but if the Chair says that he is not willing to give that hearing here, I submit to the power that is vested in the Chair, and I shall then ask for an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but I am unwilling to take the floor unless I can have a reasonable hearing. If the Chair wishes to strangle debate and prevent a hearing on this——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point, if the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that is all I desire, Mr. Chairman, but I do not consent to start out with the idea that I must make my argument within ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not change that statement in the least. If the gentleman desires to discuss the point of order within the ten minutes, the Chair will hear him. The Chair does not wish to hear the gentleman on some other subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to argue the question within ten minutes, particularly if the Chair intimates that his mind is made up; and unless I can have a reasonable time in which to make a full statement of the case, I will not accept any such terms, but I ask the Chair to recognize me in the usual way to discuss this question of order, and I ask whether——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman otherwise than he has already recognized him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the Chair's recognition is with the limitation stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The gentleman understands it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair on that proposition.

Mr. STEELE. I submit that the Chair has not decided yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the Chair has not decided.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to appeal from the authority of the Chair to limit the debate on this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman wishes to appeal from a matter of recognition. The Chair declines to entertain such an appeal.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] made his point of order, and after learning from the chairman of the committee [Mr. FOSS] that some agreement had been made or some understanding had, he consented to withhold the point of order. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] renewed the point of order and afterwards withdrew it under a statement from me that I had no intention to prolong the debate unreasonably.

Now, Mr. Chairman, subsequent to that statement the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdrew his point of order, and the gentleman from Alabama made a statement which seemed to be somewhat irritating to the gentleman from West Virginia; whereupon he announces that in view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, he renews the point of order. Now, I ask him if he is going to allow petulancy like that, coming from any gentleman on the floor, to interfere with the understanding that existed between members of the committee in regard to this matter?

Mr. DAYTON. Why, if the gentleman will pardon me, there is no petulancy, no temper; you and I know we can agree. Unanimous consent was asked, and his remarks indicated that he would not consent to anything of the kind, and there was nothing for me to do but to renew the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Illinois indicated the other day that when this question came up we should have two hours' debate on this proposition.

Mr. VANDIVER. It was the general understanding that we would have two hours' debate.

Mr. DAYTON. The gentleman has misunderstood the gentleman from Illinois. The agreement was to have two hours' debate on the Coast and Geodetic Survey. There was no time fixed as to this.

Mr. VANDIVER. I say on my responsibility as a member of this House that the gentleman is mistaken and misstates the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is entirely out of order. Any gentleman in the committee has the right to raise the point of order and insist that it shall be finally decided. This discussion is on another matter.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to make a statement.

Mr. VANDIVER. I yield temporarily to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. VANDIVER. I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Kentucky if it is understood that I could be heard upon the point of order also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already consumed his time on the point of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, I agreed to yield to him for a short time only. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the offering of the amendment at this particular point, to this paragraph of the bill, was, I say, frankly premeditated. I think that the amendment is germane to this particular paragraph, perhaps more so than it would be to the succeeding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that if this amendment is in order to the bill, it would be in order as a new paragraph at this point.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, that is why I have offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the germaneness of the amendment is concerned, the Chair does not attach much importance to that. The Chair would rather hear the gentleman on the question of whether it is new legislation.

Mr. VANDIVER. The amendment is offered as a new paragraph to the paragraph on construction and machinery. This paragraph on construction and machinery provides "on account of the hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $12,736,099" shall be appropriated. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that paragraph opens with the word "construction." This amendment proposes to "construct" a factory for the purpose of manufacturing armor plate, to carry out the provisions of the different parts of this bill. I think it is certainly germane to the paragraph. After providing that we shall construct vessels, we shall then proceed a step further and provide the means by which those vessels shall be constructed.

I think that if it were necessary to go to that point, we might assume that conditions might possibly arise whereby it would be absolutely impossible for the Government to construct these vessels and complete them according to the provisions of this bill without such a factory. Suppose, for instance, that the armor-plate factories of the world have entered into combinations—as I have no doubt they have—by which the price of armor plate is to be fixed by an agreement among them; and suppose, furthermore, that exercising their absolute control over the market price of armor plate, they should put it clearly out of the reach of the Government of the United States; then I want to ask how it would be possible for the Secretary of the Navy to carry out this provision of this bill for the construction of any vessels unless he were authorized to make this armor plate for the Government?

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. VANDIVER. I yield now to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES. Secretary Herbert in his report found that after the Bethlehem Company and the Carnegie Company had furnished the Russian Government armor plate at $249 a ton, they, together with all the armor-plate manufacturers of this country and Europe, put up the price of plate to $565 a ton.

Mr. VANDIVER. There is no doubt about that. Now, Mr. Chairman, in all fairness and candor and good faith this amendment is offered. And I want to say that it was the understanding of the minority of this committee that they should have time for the offering of this amendment and its consideration at this time. I am sorry as well as surprised that the gentleman from West Virginia at this late hour should undertake to interfere with the understanding by raising the point of order. If the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. Chairman, had served his country as well as he serves the manufacturing and protected interests, and especially the armor-plate factories, he would certainly be entitled to more credit for his service on this floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I raise the point of order, not as a member of the committee but as a member of the House, that the gentleman is not talking to the point of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. I am talking to the point of order. If the Chair should hold—and I want to call attention to this particular point—if the Chair should hold that this amendment is not in order and thus rule it out, and give this House no opportunity to vote upon it, the result might be, and not unreasonably may be, that the armor-plate factories of this country, holding absolute power over the subject, could hold up this Government worse even than they have done, and put it out of the power of the Secretary of the Navy to increase the Navy and build the battle ships herein provided for.

I think, if the Chairman of the committee will consider for a moment what may be and probably will be the consequences of such a ruling, he will at least hesitate before surrendering this Government to the dictation of the armor trust which now controls the price of armor throughout the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. I notify the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] that if he insists upon his point of order he will gain no time by it, for I shall offer it as a resolution to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the privilege of the Chair to hear discussion upon any point of order; but it is no hardship upon the House or the committee if he declines, because the committee can indulge in debate on an appeal from the decision of the Chair to any extent it wishes. The Chair thinks the rule is a wise one, leaving it in the discretion of the Chair to hear discussion or otherwise. For that reason the Chair enforced the rule in this instance.

Now, the question is——

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is stating a ruling.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman wait until the Chair finishes his ruling?

Mr. VANDIVER. I beg the Chair's pardon; I understood the Chair to say that he had made the ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is making the ruling. The question is whether this amendment authorizing the building of a plant for any purpose in the way of making armor plate is new legislation on an appropriation bill. It is not a question of building new buildings in place of old ones, the replacing of buildings already made; it is not a question like those which were decided in reference to the Naval Academy. There it was held that the Government already had a work in progress, the naval school, in the language of the decision of Mr. Cox in the West Point Academy case, and they could build a new building there for that purpose. This is not that question. The Government has never gone into the armor-plate business; it has always bought what is needed by contract. It has never made any, never had any plant for the construction of armor plate, and therefore it seems to the Chair to be most clearly new legislation. It is in line with all the decisions, even the decisions made in the West Point case and the Annapolis case in former Congresses, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and on the appeal I desire to say a word. I find on page 4227 of the RECORD that the chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS], when the question was up as to the length of debate on this question, said that he was willing to agree to this, that the understanding when the armor-plate question was reached——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the appeal.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am discussing the appeal. I am stating the ground why it is necessary for us to overrule the decision of the Chair in this instance, and I am stating the parliamentary situation, the agreement that was attempted to be entered into. The understanding was that when we reached the armor-plate——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, how, when I have only uttered one sentence, the Chair or the gentleman from Iowa can say that I am not discussing the appeal. I am entitled to state the proposition under discussion. But if the Chair does not want me to go at it in that way, I can probably show wherein the proposition comes in a different way. I will read, when it is more clear to the Chair that this is within the discussion.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the committee two years ago a provision was put in the bill providing that unless armor plate could be purchased at $300 a ton the Secretary of the Navy should purchase no further armor. It also provided that unless he was able to purchase the armor at $300 a ton he should not go on with the construction of the battle ships provided for in that bill.

Now, the situation that presents itself to us on this point of order is not the same as stated by the Chair, not the same conditions that existed when Mr. Sherman two years ago rendered his decision, but we are confronted, as I desired to say to the Chair, but was unable to say—we are confronted by a new condition. We have three battle ships the construction of which are provided for by the law of the land to-day. They are necessary to the completion of our naval establishment. We have made what Congress believes to be a reasonable appropriation for the furnishing of the armor plate for these vessels, and the Secretary of the Navy has offered to purchase this armor at those figures. There is nobody, no armor-plate factory, no contractor, that is willing to furnish armor plate to the United States Government.

Now, that is the condition that confronts us. That is the law of the land to-day. The Government has provided the money and appropriated the money to build these three battle ships, and as a necessary part of building these battle ships we must have armor plate.

Mr. BARBER. Has not the Government already bought 400 tons of armor plate during the past year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but that was for ships of the Alabama type.

Mr. BARBER. They can get the same for any other type.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman did not understand my argument. I state that the ships of the Maine type are unprovided for; the ships of the Alabama class are provided for; but we have now three ships that we can not get armor for under the existing law.

Mr. BARBER. Yes, we can, if we take the kind of armor we have been getting heretofore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend evidently does not go with me in my argument. I am discussing the question from the standpoint of the law as it exists to-day. I say we can not get the armor under existing law; not that we can not get armor if we pay $1,000 a ton for it, or if we change the law; but the proposition, as it confronts this House, is what we can do under existing law, and under existing law we can not buy any armor. There is nobody who would furnish us with any armor, and yet we must build these battle ships.

Mr. MADDOX. What is the existing law? What was it we agreed to pay for this armor?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We agreed to pay $300 a ton for armor; and the bill provided that unless we could purchase it at $300 a ton no armor should be made for these three ships—that the contract should be delayed until the armor was purchased.

Mr. MADDOX. What does this bill provide?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This bill, in a subsequent section, attempts to strike out all that and provide for paying a higher price.

Mr. MADDOX. What price?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five hundred and forty-five dollars a ton.

Mr. MADDOX. Why is not that a change of existing law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is; and when we reach that section, if the point of order be not made by somebody else, I propose to make it.

Mr. BARBER. One question further: Does not the Secretary of the Navy say that the difficulty is that he can not obtain armor of a suitable quality for $300 a ton; not that he can not obtain armor, but that the quality of the armor obtainable is not what he wants?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the Secretary of the Navy says that.

Mr. BARBER. I will refer the gentleman to his letter——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me a minute, I will answer his question. I shall have to go into some facts and figures on the question.

Mr. BARBER. I simply refer the gentleman——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know what the Secretary of the Navy said. I have his report here.

Mr. BARBER. He gives the reason he has not contracted for armor—that he could not obtain it of suitable quality at the price fixed.

Mr. GAINES. That he could not obtain that which they claim to be the best quality—the Krupp armor; but we contend that the harveyized armor is just as good.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the question is not whether the Secretary of the Navy can get the armor, but whether it can be got at a suitable figure. Now, to answer the gentleman's question fully it is necessary for me to go into some facts and figures in reference to the cost of this armor, and whether it can be gotten in any other way, in order to build these battle ships and carry out existing law.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that the materials consumed in the manufacture of a ton of armor plate cost only $56.75; that the entire labor cost for a ton of armor plate is only $43.65; that the cost of keeping the plant ready for use is $9.80 a ton; that shop expenses are $2.38 a ton; office expenses and contingencies, $3.34 a ton; experimental work, $1.67 a ton; administration and engineering, $21.40 a ton.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that the gentleman is not discussing the question of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked me a question——

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman will confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the question of appeal to this House as to whether this is in line with the rules and precedents of the House and as to whether it is necessary to carry out existing law involves the question as to whether there is any other way of providing for this material; and that is just what I am talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will endeavor to do so.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that when a gentleman has been called to order and when the Chair has sustained the point of order, it is his duty to take his seat——

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct——

Mr. HEPBURN. And that he can then only proceed by the consent of the House——

A MEMBER. Upon motion.

Mr. HEPBURN. Upon motion. I insist on the rule.

Mr. GAINES. That is a technical rule, which is insisted on now for the first time in this debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. In answer to that point of order, I insist that the Chair did not raise it, but directed the gentleman from Alabama to proceed in order, without a motion; and I submit that it is now too late, after the Chair has directed——

The CHAIRMAN. After the Chair had directed the gentleman from Alabama to proceed in order, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] made the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama should take his seat under the rule when the point of order is made and until it is decided.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Alabama be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. And, Mr. Chairman, prior to that, I insist that the gentleman from Alabama should resume his seat.

Mr. UNDERWOOD resumed his seat.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the table.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no table in Committee of the Whole. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa is not in order. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I move to close the debate on the appeal.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, is not the only motion before the committee now the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that the gentleman from Alabama proceed under the rule?

Mr. DALZELL. The motion I have made is not debatable.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Did not the Chair recognize the gentleman from Georgia and permit him to make his motion before recognizing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia made the point of order that the Chair had directed the gentleman to proceed in order——

Mr. BARTLETT. No, Mr. Chairman; not that.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). The gentleman from Georgia made the point that the Chair had already directed the gentleman from Alabama to proceed in order. The gentleman from Iowa made the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama must first take his seat before any decision could be made on the point of order.

The Chair ruled that the gentleman from Alabama should take his seat. The gentleman from Alabama did not do so, and the gentleman from Iowa then made the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama must take his seat, and the gentleman from Alabama thereupon resumed his seat. The gentleman from Iowa then rose, and the gentleman from Georgia, both standing at the same time, and both making their motions, the gentleman from Georgia moving that the gentleman from Alabama should proceed in order, and the gentleman from Iowa moving that the appeal be laid upon the table. The Chair ruled the latter motion to be out of order; whereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] rose, addressed the Chair, and was recognized to submit his motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to permit me just a moment. I know the Chair would not wish to make a misstatement as to what actually occurred.

Mr. DALZELL. Is not the motion that I have made in order, Mr. Chairman, and not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair is mistaken, I was about to say, as to the statement of fact; and if necessary, I appeal to the stenographer's notes to show that, before the gentleman from Iowa asked the gentleman from Alabama to take his seat, I had made the motion that the gentleman should be permitted to proceed in order. That was prior to either the recognition of the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, if that is true, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Chair does not desire to do any injustice, and I appeal to the Official Reporter's notes to sustain the statement I make with reference to the occurrence in the House.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, the trouble about the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia is that the gentleman made his motion before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had taken his seat, and his motion, therefore, when made, was not, under the rule, in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. And yet, Mr. Chairman, I made the motion, and the Chair had recognized me, and up to this time I have never——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Up to this time I have still remained upon my feet for that purpose, and, the Chair having recognized me, I submit to the Chair that it is unfair to me and unfair to the House and unfair to the gentleman from Alabama thus to cut off the motion that I had made and was preparing to make, and there is no rule of the House, except an arbitrary and brutal motion to strangle debate——

The CHAIRMAN. Notwithstanding the last statement of the gentleman from Georgia, the Chair will state that the Chair has no desire to do any injustice to any member of the committee or of the House. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to make the point as stated by the Chair. Now the gentleman from Georgia states that he made the motion that the gentleman from Alabama be permitted to proceed in order. The Chair will entertain that motion, which must be decided without debate.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 73.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the gentleman will proceed, under the rule, to explain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I may have order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition comes to the point where I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I sought to answer a question of his when I was called to order.

I will return to the proposition that I was discussing when I was interrupted, and that is that, these battle ships being provided for and there being no way by which we can provide armor under the bill, it is in order for us now to provide a way.

As the Chair has stated, it has been held by previous Congresses that the creation of an entirely new battle ship, where there had been no previous appropriation, is in order and not in contravention of the rule. That has been repeatedly held. It has further been held and decided here, not longer ago than yesterday, that in order to carry on and build up a naval establishment in the United States it was in order to erect an entirely new building at the Academy at Annapolis.

The same thing has been held with reference to the building of a building at West Point in order to maintain and build up the Army of the United States. They have gone further than that. This House has sustained the ruling of the Chair that it is in order, upon a general appropriation bill, to provide for the maintenance and the education of seamen necessary to man the Navy, to pass special legislation with reference to seamen to man the Navy, although there was no general law, and the Chair is familiar with that decision, although there was no law specially authorizing it previously; yet that new legislation providing for it on an appropriation bill was in order, because it was necessary to build up the general naval establishment of the country.

Now, to return to the proposition before the House. Here we have legislation directing the Secretary of the Navy to build three armored war ships of the United States. He is directed to purchase that armor, if he can do it, within a certain figure, but if he can not he is prohibited from purchasing the armor.

That is the law as it stands on the statute books to-day. The Secretary of the Navy has advertised for bids. The armor-plate factories of this country refuse to furnish the armor at the price that the Congress of the United States has said was a reasonable price. Now, we must build up this naval establishment——

Mr. DAYTON. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am discussing the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD took his seat.

Mr. DALZELL. I move that debate on the appeal be now closed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, surely the Chair did not hear the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that debate be now closed.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 79.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will act as tellers.

The committee again divided.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a question of privilege. I request that the pairs be announced before the tellers announce the result of this vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think pairs should be announced in Committee of the Whole. It is an unprecedented thing; and the Chair does not think it can be done.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I understand that it can be asked for as a matter of privilege at the request of a member, unless there is objection. The pairs will show how gentlemen who are paired are voting on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think pairs can be announced. On this question tellers report—ayes 96, noes 82. Debate is therefore closed, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 84.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will please take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 83.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the decision of the Chair therefore becomes the judgment of the committee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the act of March 2, 1895; for those authorized by the act of June 10, 1896; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1897; for those authorized by the act of May 4, 1898; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1899, and for those authorized by this act, $4,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure by contract armor of the best quality for the battle ships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, at a cost not to exceed $545 a ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties.

Mr. VANDIVER. I desire, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order before debate begins.

Mr. VANDIVER. That is what I am going to do.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the words "five hundred and forty-five dollars," contained in the twentieth and twenty-first lines, change existing law, and are therefore out of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VANDIVER. I desire to be heard upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois first, and afterwards the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VANDIVER. All right.

Mr. FOSS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want simply to say that, in my judgment, that point of order is not well taken, and I refer the Chair to the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, page 3482 of the RECORD, where it was held that a distinction existed between a limitation upon the present appropriation bill and a future provision making new law; and in the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, on page 2190 of the RECORD, the same identical question came up, and the Chair sustained the point of order against this limitation referring to the future, and when these words were struck out overruled it; so that I refer to two precedents in the past to show that this point of order is not well taken. That was a limitation upon that appropriation bill. I want to call the Chair's attention to the further fact that this limitation is a new provision upon this legislative act.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, by the act of March 19, I think it was, 1898, the price of armor plate was limited to $400 per ton.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman that act?

Mr. VANDIVER. I have not it here with me. I am not sure of the exact date, but I know it was in 1898.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that that act is contained in the next paragraph.

Mr. VANDIVER. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, the act of March 3, 1899, limits the price which the Secretary of the Navy may pay for armor plate to $300 per ton. Now, we may suppose at least, Mr. Chairman, that that law of 1899 holds good until it is repealed. It is the law to-day. The Secretary of the Navy has himself stated that he was unable to purchase armor plate because that is the law now. If that be the law, this provision here, which increases the price to $545 per ton, evidently changes existing law, and therefore, according to the precedent that the Chair has just established, and which is a long-standing precedent in fact, this particular paragraph is obnoxious to existing law, and subject to the point of order.

I desire further to call the attention of the Chair to the ruling just a few minutes ago, made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] providing that the three armored cruisers should be constructed in the Government navy-yards. That the Chair ruled was a change of existing law; and now, in a few minutes afterwards, comes in this proposition that the gentleman from West Virginia makes objection to, and tries to show that it is not a change of existing law. Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if the Secretary of the Navy is not now able to purchase this armor plate because this is the law, then this increase of the price does change existing law, and is subject to the point of order.

Furthermore, as I am reminded by my friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], the gentleman in charge of the bill finds it necessary by the next paragraph of the bill to repeal the existing law.

Now, then, perhaps the gentleman will claim that the next paragraph will repeal it, but I want to ask what right has he to assume that it is going to be repealed? That very paragraph itself would be subject to a point of order. The fact that the next paragraph repeals that law is of sufficient evidence that, in the judgment of the committee that framed this bill, this would change existing law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to unnecessarily consume the time of the committee. I think it is certainly clear, and must be clear to the Chair, that this would be a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the change in the limitation of $545. He calls attention to the fact that the ships provided for in this paragraph are ships constructed under the law of 1898. Now, the language on the following page is:

"And provided further, That no contract for the armor for any vessels authorized by this act—shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties, and in no case shall a contract be made for the construction of the hull of any vessel authorized by this act until a contract has been made for the armor of such vessels," is hereby removed.

That is, the act of 1899, and not the act of 1898—

The gentleman stated that there was some limitation in the act of 1898, and the Chair asked what, and the gentleman from Alabama responded that it was on the following page, and the language on the following page is from the act of 1899.

Mr. VANDIVER. If the Chair will pardon me, the act of 1898 provided for $400 and the law of 1899 provided for $300 a ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The law of 1898 the Chair has before him, and it refers to the battle ships authorized by the law of 1896:

Provided, That the total cost of armor, according to the plans and specifications already approved for the three battle ships authorized by the act of June 10, 1896, shall not exceed $3,210,000, including all costs of nickel, etc.

That is the only limitation the Chair finds.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, if the Chair will allow me, I call his attention to the fact that in line 10 and in the first part of line 11, of this page 64, these vessels are authorized by the act of June——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman still further to the language:

And no contract for armor plate shall be made at an average rate of not exceeding $400 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including nickel, as aforesaid.

That probably is the language the gentleman refers to.

Mr. VANDIVER. I call the Chair's attention to the fact that the vessels authorized by the act of 1896 are the very ones mentioned in this paragraph and for which the armor is to be purchased at $545 a ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the vessels provided for in 1896 are spoken of here. It says:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to procure armor plate of the best quality for the battle ships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, at a cost, etc.

Mr. VANDIVER. But just before that in the bill now under consideration——

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). And the proviso only refers to the battle ships authorized under the law of 1898.

Mr. VANDIVER. I beg the Chair's pardon. It applies to both.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It expressly recites the act of 1896.

Mr. VANDIVER. And refers to vessels under that act as well as the other.

The CHAIRMAN. It says:

Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the act of March 2, 1895; for those authorized by the act of June 10, 1896; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1897; for those authorized by the act of May 4, 1898; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1899, and for those authorized by this act, $4,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure by contract armor of the best quality for the battle ships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, at a cost not to exceed $545 a ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties.

Now, this limitation only applies to the three battle ships constructed under the law of 1898.

Mr. VANDIVER. Even on that supposition this very act here increases the price to $545—increases the price of those provided for in the act of 1898, the law of which limited the price to $400.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, I desire to make this suggestion to the Chair: The building of the battle ships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri was provided for by the law of 1898. The armor that was provided for these battle ships was provided for by the act of March 3, 1899, which this bill seeks to repeal.

The CHAIRMAN. In a subsequent paragraph.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In a subsequent paragraph. It repeals it here; repeals the law that authorized the armor for these particular vessels under the act of March 3, 1899. That is the law to-day in reference to the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question under that construction of that language—whether it is or not——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The naval appropriation bill of last year carried this provision for those ships, because all other ships of the Navy up to the time of the authorization of these had their armor already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, that was the interpretation of the Department at that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It did not involve any interpretation of the Department. The Department reported that those ships needed armor at that time. That will be found to be the fact if the Chair will refer to the report. And the law is based on that fact—that those ships needed this armor.

Mr. VANDIVER. Allow me to suggest that under either ruling of the Department these words change existing law; because if the Department should hold that the armor for these vessels should be purchased under the act of 1898 it would be limited to $400 a ton, and if the armor was to be purchased under the act of 1899 the Department would be limited to $300 a ton. But this provision raises the price which may be paid to $545; so that in either case there is a change of existing law.

Mr. DAYTON. The language fixing the price is a limitation upon that year's appropriation and expired with it.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Why repeal it, then, by this act?

Mr. DAYTON. We are not proposing to repeal it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] that the question is whether that language is limited to that appropriation or whether it is general language covering all armor plate to be purchased. That is the very question, and that depends upon the interpretation of the language. It seems that the Department has held that this limitation applied to armor plate for these very vessels; and still that might have been a limitation on that appropriation of $4,000,000.

Mr. DAYTON. Therefore that appropriation has not been used. But here is a new appropriation. That is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair. This appropriation is under the control of this House. The price of a thing may change. It would be impossible to finish that work already commenced if the Department were to be limited in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that one question is whether the previous law has limited the amount for which armor plate should be bought for these vessels, independently of the appropriation. The Chair must say that the language seems to him involved, and there is room for difference of interpretation as to whether the limitation should apply simply to that appropriation or should apply generally to the purchase of armor plate in the future.

Mr. VANDIVER. Does the Chair hold that my point of order is sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled yet on that subject. The Chair is suggesting a doubt as to the interpretation of the language itself—as to whether it applied to that appropriation simply as a limitation, or whether it was a positive and general provision of law that no armor plate should be purchased at a price exceeding that specified.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the further question would then arise as to whether this limitation applied to those vessels.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just the point upon which I want to be heard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the act of 1899 provided armor for those ships that had not had armor provided for them by previous acts. Those ships were the Maine, the Ohio, and the Missouri; and so plain was that construction of the act that the Secretary of the Navy has held that he was not able to furnish armor for the Maine, the Ohio, and the Missouri because——

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair interrupt the gentleman right there—because under that provision, whether it be taken as a limitation upon the appropriation itself or a general provision of law, the Secretary of the Navy could not use the appropriation. So the holding of the Secretary of the Navy does not seem to throw much light upon the question suggested by the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What I was going to say was this: The Secretary of the Navy has properly held that he can not go ahead and get the armor for these three ships because, by the existing law of 1899, he is limited to the price of $300 a ton as a matter of law and because, as a matter of fact, he could not buy armor at that price.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that there would be the same difficulty on the part of the Secretary of the Navy if the limitation applied only to the appropriation itself, because if he were limited in expending that appropriation to $300 a ton, he could not expend the money; and he had no money available, even if there was no change of law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But, Mr. Chairman, the very law which limited the Secretary to $300 a ton for this armor was the law with reference to these very vessels. It was not merely a limitation, but was a law declaring that the Secretary of the Navy should pay only a certain price in the purchase of armor; in other words, that he should not buy armor except at the price named or below it—that is to say, that any armor which he had to buy for the purposes then existing should not exceed that sum—and some of the purposes so existing are found embodied in the bill; that is to say, the armor for these very ships.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Can I have the attention of the Chair for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield to a suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the Chair to this fact, in line with the difficulty which seems to be present in his mind in connection with the point of order, that the limitation of the price to $300 a ton for this armor plate did not apply in the act of 1899 to the specific appropriation made in the bill of that year, but was a general limitation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; it was a general limitation upon the armor to be purchased for any purpose, and not a specific limitation upon the purchases for that particular year.

The CHAIRMAN. The language, the Chair will state, is precisely this:

> That no contract for the armor for any of the vessels authorized by this act.

And so forth.

Now, what does that mean? Does it mean armor for the vessels authorized by the act of 1899, or does it extend to the purchase of all armor for all purposes? In other words, is the question applicable to the armor authorized by the act for all purposes, or only for either or all of the vessels—the three vessels? That is the distinction that occurs to the Chair; and the difficulty is in the interpretation of the language.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think if the Chair would read the entire section he would have no difficulty in arriving at the same understanding of the law that we have reached. It says that armor purchased shall be purchased at a certain price. Read the exact language of the law of March 3, 1899:

> Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the act of July 26, 1894, of the vessels authorized under the act of March 2, 1895, of those authorized by the act of June 10, 1896, of those authorized by the act of March 3, 1897, of those authorized by the act of May 4, 1898, and of those authorized by this act, $4,000,000: Provided, That in procuring armor for the seagoing coast-line battle ships and the harbor defense vessels of the monitor type, authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, approved May 4, 1898, the Secretary of the Navy may contract for suitable armor for said vessels under the limitations as to price for the same as fixed by this act.

Now, as we all well understand, these vessels, the Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, were authorized under the act of May 4, 1898.

> And provided further, That no contracts for the armor for any vessels authorized by this act shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties, and in no case shall a contract be made for the construction of the hull of any vessel authorized by this act until a contract has been made for the armor of such vessel.

The Chair will observe that the language used applies to the vessels authorized by the act of 1898. There is no question of that; and it goes on to say that the price for armor plate shall be the price in that act; and in the next proviso of that act the price is fixed at $300 a ton.

That is the construction of the Navy Department itself. They refused to go beyond that given price, and finally refused to act at all in reference to the armor plate for these vessels because by the limitation of price they could not get the best kind of armor for the sum named.

Now, that construction having been presented to the country through the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and having been acted on by the entire Naval Committee, the committee put in this provision in the bill. Unless this construction is correct, why the necessity of this provision that the Secretary is authorized to buy the armor at $545 a ton?

Is that the law now? If so, this provision is an absurdity; and I quote from the majority report here. It says:

> Your committee recommend that this restriction—
> Of $300 per ton—
> be removed and that contracts be authorized, so that the construction of the hulls of these vessels may go on without further delay.

That shows that they were recognizing the $300-a-ton limitation as law, and if everybody had not so understood it this provision would not have been in here. If it is now the law to pay $545 per ton for this armor, then it is an absurd provision to put in this bill. But, however the Chair may rule upon this (because it seems to me the more I have tried to convince the Chair this week the less I have succeeded), it seems to me it ought to be well known to every one here that there is no law to-day by which you can buy this armor at any price in excess of $300 per ton.

Therefore the Navy Department resorts to the committee and the committee resorts to the House with this bill changing existing law, which limits it to $300 per ton, changes it to apply to these three battle ships. All this was well considered in the committee, I will say. If this does not change existing law, then it is another instance in which I do not understand this rule. But to my judgment it is clear that this provision is contrary to section 2 of Rule XXI, and the point of order made against it should be sustained.

Mr. LACEY. I call the attention of the Chair to clause 2 of Rule XXI. Now, it appears that this is an appropriation of $545 a ton in order to continue a public work. The completion of a naval vessel, although the work has long been interrupted, has been held to be the continuation of a public work. The construction of a new vessel in the Navy is also a continuation of a public work.

Mr. KITCHIN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LACEY. In a moment. Now, the provision as to continuing a public work and as to changing existing law is found in the second paragraph of Rule XXI. The limitation of the first part of the paragraph is the one that we are really called upon to meet. Can it be claimed that when an appropriation is made and a price of material fixed, after a building has been authorized, that we can not meet a subsequent rise in the price by an increased appropriation because the original appropriation was based on a lower price? If so, the earlier part of the rule would be entirely inoperative.

Now, take the rule by its four corners and examine it as a whole. Here we have a public work authorized by existing law. The proposition now is to appropriate money. They say if you appropriate the money at more than $300 a ton it changes existing law. That may be true, but it also carries on a work already begun, and therefore the other part of the rule comes in, and a fair construction of the whole rule does not render this House powerless to go on and complete a public building partly constructed or to complete a steel-clad vessel partly constructed. Now, it seems to me, by taking this as a whole——

The CHAIRMAN. What becomes of the last clause of the rule?

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order on any general appropriation bill or any amendment thereto.

Mr. LACEY. Now, the existing law applies only to these particular ships, and they are covered in the other part of the rule, which refers to a continuation of public works already in progress. Consequently you can change existing law as to a building or public work already started by an appropriation bill, and that of necessity must be the rule. If that were not the rule we should be powerless, because of a rule of the House, to complete a structure that had been started, where even the national defense was involved in its completion.

Suppose a light-house is contracted for when iron is worth so much a ton, and we put a limitation in the appropriation bill that this light-house shall not cost more than so much a ton. It has already been authorized by existing law. It is partly built. Now, the other part of the rule comes in and provides that you may make appropriations, although not authorized by the terms of existing law, although changing the existing law, if it is to continue a public work already in progress, already in process of execution.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The ground that the gentleman takes is so much broader than the necessities of the case require, and touches upon matters so general, that I should like to ask the gentleman if he understands the rule to be, in case a public building of any kind is authorized, and a limit is fixed in the act authorizing that public building, that it is in order on a general appropriation bill to appropriate in excess of that limit of cost?

Mr. LACEY. Suppose that it was authorized, and subsequently there is a provision that we shall not pay over $6 a thousand for brick. The work is in process of construction. Subsequent to the provision for that particular work that provision is inserted. I say you may change existing law as to a public work that is already in process of construction.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. This is a matter of the very greatest importance, because almost every public building that was authorized in the last Congress, or a great many of them, can not be constructed within the limit Congress prescribed; and the question comes to the Committee on Appropriations, for instance, and is there to-day, whether without legislative action by Congress appropriations in excess of the limit prescribed by Congress may be made. With all due respect to the gentleman from Iowa, I doubt if we can. I think that the rule limits us. I think that the provision is obnoxious to the other part of Rule XXI, and it must go out on a point of order. If it changes existing law, it must go out on a point of order, even if in continuance of a public work.

Mr. LACEY. An appropriation not authorized by law always changes existing law, because the existing law is that there is no law on the subject. Now, when the rule expressly provides that after a public building is started that then you may make an appropriation, notwithstanding the general law, it is intended to meet such a case as you have already suggested. If you had started a public building that was to cost $50,000, and you find that you can not construct it for that money, you must lose what you have expended or may have to spend $75,000 instead; and having commenced the work, you must go on and complete it, because it is authorized by existing law.

Mr. COWHERD. The question was ruled on by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] when presiding over the Committee of the Whole this session, and he ruled just contrary to the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. You will find rulings on every side of every question in Committee of the Whole. I am trying to get a correct ruling on this particular question. [Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. VANDIVER. I desire to submit one observation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The only question here is whether it changes existing law.

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. This provision——

Mr. VANDIVER. Now let me make a suggestion. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will permit the Chair to rule.

The Chair has been referred to the law of 1899, "armor and armament." The paragraph of that law—the whole paragraph—relates to the armament; to armor and armament of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by the different acts from 1894 to 1898, inclusive, with the proviso:

Provided, That in procuring armor for the seagoing coast-line battleships and the harbor-defense vessels of the monitor type, authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, approved May 4, 1898, the Secretary of the Navy may contract for suitable armor for said vessels under the limitations as to price for the same as fixed by this act: And provided further, That no contracts for the armor of any vessel authorized by this act shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties, and in no case shall a contract be made for the construction of the hull of any vessel authorized by this act until a contract has been made for the armor of such vessel.

Now, the Chair thinks, taking the whole paragraph, that the intention of Congress in passing that law, and the intention of the law, was to apply to the armor for all of those vessels, and that it was not a limitation upon the appropriation, but was positively a legislative limit on the price of armor plate of $300 per ton; and, of course, to fix a limit at a greater price in this bill would be a change of existing law. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MAHON. I want to offer an amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Navy to have a thorough test made of the McAllister system of built-up armor plating; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to cause such tests to be made as may, in his opinion, demonstrate its efficiency as compared with the solid armor plating now in use.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I make that motion simply to submit to the committee a statement which will take but a minute. In the debate of April 17 the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER] made a statement with reference to a clipping he had made from the New York World, and which he stated he did not know whether it was true or not, but further said it seemed to have some authorization.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not paying attention to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said. If the committee will be in order, the Chair will try to hear what is said.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. DRIGGS. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Kentucky said:

I have in my pocket here a little clipping that I got out of a paper a few days ago, and whether true or not I can not say; but here is a statement taken from the New York World, which I will not take up the time of the House to read, but still perhaps I may be permitted to state its contents. It is a declaration, appearing to be authoritative, that the Cramp shipyards and the Carnegie Steel Company have combined, for what purpose will be apparent to the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Cramp is president of the William Cramp & Sons Company of shipbuilders, which is a corporation. He is an esteemed constituent of mine, and inasmuch as this becomes a matter which will go into the permanent RECORD, in view of the gentleman's statement, Mr. Cramp has authorized me to say that a counter statement should be made, and that neither on the part of the Carnegie Company nor the William Cramp & Sons Company has there ever been a proposition for combination with reference to armor plate.

That is all I desire to state; and I know that Mr. Cramp's words will be taken by this House, for he is a truthful man and correct in every particular.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire on earth to question the credibility of Mr. Cramp. I know him, and I have no question but that he is an honorable gentleman. I did not charge this fact to be true. I notice that the gentleman qualifies his statement somewhat in this matter. He says that no proposition had been made from the Cramps for a combination.

Mr. BINGHAM. Or from the Carnegie Company. There was none from the Carnegie Company to the Cramps, or from the Cramps to the Carnegie Company.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. And by no person authorized from either side?

Mr. BINGHAM. None whatever. The whole statement in the World is incorrect.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I did not charge it to be true. I only took my authority from the New York World.

Mr. BINGHAM. My proposition was only to let it run on all fours with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the hour of 5.30 having arrived, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that motion will be voted down.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were 71 ayes and 102 noes.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make a statement in order to define the correct position of this side of the House, as I understand it. In regard to the point of order that has just been raised, I wish to say that the minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs and most of this side of the House really have no objection to the section that is stricken out, but we desire to take the sense of the House on the proposition to construct an armor-plate factory.

The acting chairman of the committee [Mr. Foss] will remember that I told him that if an opportunity was given for the House to vote on this question no point of order would be raised, but unless there was an opportunity we would raise the point of order in the hope of being able to test the sense of the representatives of the American people on the question. I say this in deference to the position we occupy on this side of the House. We really are not opposed to the section stricken out, but resort to the point of order because we have been driven to it by what we consider unfair tactics.

Let me qualify my statement a little further. I do not wish, as suggested by my colleague near by, to be understood as committing this side of the House to paying willingly $545 per ton for armor plate; but we would pay that rather than to allow the three battle ships to rust on the stocks. What we desire particularly is that the representatives of the people may have an opportunity to provide for the future supply of armor at reasonable prices.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. What paragraph does the gentleman allude to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading the paragraph in relation to armor plate.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I thought that was out.

Mr. RIDGELY. Do I understand that all that part from line 15 has been been stricken out on page 64?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Kansas that that section has not been read, and the amendment is out of order.

Mr. RIDGELY. Let me ask where the Clerk is reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk began to read on line 23, page 64, and read two lines when he was interrupted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following restriction under the heading "Armor and armament" in the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," namely: "And provided further, That no contract for the armor for any vessels authorized by this act shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties, and in no case shall a contract be made for the construction of the hull of any vessel authorized by this act until a contract has been made for the armor of such vessels," is hereby removed, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, upon the passage of this act, to let the contracts for the vessels therein referred to, subject to all other requirements relating to the same as contained in said act of March 3, 1899, except as to sheathing and coppering, which is hereby made discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order on this paragraph also.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment: Toward the completion of the equipment outfit of the new vessels heretofore authorized, $250,000.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I make this motion for the purpose of giving notice that when this bill shall have been reported to the House, I shall move a resolution to recommit it with instructions to the committee to bring in the following amendment:

That the sum of $2,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of suitable buildings and the purchase of suitable machinery and other materials necessary for the establishment and maintenance of a plant for furnishing armor plate for the use of the Navy.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to appoint a board, to consist of three officers of the Navy, who shall examine and report what in their opinion is the most suitable site for the erection of the plant provided for in the foregoing section of this act; and no money shall be expended until the point so selected shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word. I think I may safely say——

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would ask the gentleman whether the minority has consented to that specific motion of recommittal?

Mr. VANDIVER. No, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I hope the gentleman will not undertake to commit us on that point until we have had some consultation.

Mr. VANDIVER. I have an understanding with other gentlemen about that which will be satisfactory to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not want to be committed to that special amendment.

Mr. VANDIVER. I do not yield for the purpose of discussion.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the Chair will recognize me immediately after the gentleman from Missouri has concluded.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to say that there are three propositions which I think are undisputed and can not be successfully disputed: First. That so far as we have any special information before this committtee, the actual cost of material and labor in a ton of armor plate is not in excess of $250. What amount should be added to that for the maintenance of plant and the profit on investment, I shall not undertake to say except this much: That the committee of Congress which investigated this subject in 1897 reported unanimously that these additions to that cost ought not to bring the price of armor plate above $300 per ton. Secondly, We have the report of a committee appointed by Congress to investigate the question of the cost of establishing an armor-plate factory——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. I ask unanimous consent to occupy just two minutes more.

Mr. FOSS and others objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. FOSS. I move to close debate upon the pending paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to state that at the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] we passed an item with reference to dredging, I think, at the Dry Tortugas.

The CHAIRMAN. The several paragraphs heretofore passed over and reserved will be read.

The Clerk read the paragraph beginning with line 16, on page 24, in relation to depots for coal.

Mr. McRAE. That is not the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph beginning at line 24, page 24, which was passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Boston, Mass.: Ship fitters' shop, to cost not more than $200,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $100,000; rebuilding building 42, $75,000; refitting and improving machine shop No. 1, building 42, to cost not more than $100,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $50,000; trusses under pattern-shop floor, building 42, $10,000; extension of building 40, equipment shops, $100,000; chain and anchor-storage shed for equipment, $90,000; yards and docks shop building, $90,000; new piers and wharves, $50,000; paving, $25,000; railroad and platform scales, $5,300; crane scow, $20,000; wharf-pillar crane, $6,000; dredging, $30,000; new caisson for stone dry dock, to be immediately available, $40,000, and the unexpended appropriation for swinging gates in the act of March 3, 1897, is hereby reappropriated for caisson; machine tools for yards and docks shops, $5,000; electric elevators, $10,000; smithery for construction and repair, to cost not more than $200,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $100,000; fire-protection system, $60,000; in all, navy-yard, Boston, $866,300.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I understand this paragraph was passed over by unanimous consent upon the request of my colleague. I desire now to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, after the word "dollars," in line 3, insert "metal workers' shop, to cost not more than $200,000, for which contract is hereby authorized, $100,000."

On page 26 strike out, in line 2, the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine."

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I do not purpose to take much of the time of the committee in the presentation of this amendment, but I do desire to present a few facts and one or two reasons in support of the amendment, which I think will be conclusive upon the members of this body.

It must be known to all—it certainly is to the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs and should be to the members of this committee—that the navy-yard at Boston, Mass., is the second yard, in value of its real estate and chattels, in the country. It is only exceeded in that respect by the navy-yard in New York, and has more than double the real estate and chattels of any other yard outside of the one I have mentioned in New York.

I wish to say also that in point of value of machinery it stands third among the repair yards of the country. The great navy-yard at New York has only about $5,000 more of machinery than the Boston yard.

Mr. FOSS. May I interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts for a suggestion?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Mr. FOSS. I will state to the gentleman that the committee have carefully looked over the provision in question, and since the committee have investigated I have received a letter from the constructor at the Boston yard, who seems very anxious that this shop should be built; and while there has been no action taken by the committee in the preparation and the reporting of this bill on this appropriation, yet if I may in any manner for the committee, I will be pleased to accept the amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ROBERTS. Then I ask a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph of the bill which was passed over by consent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 9:
"Dredging, Dry Tortugas, Florida: Dredging channel $1,000."

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order against that when the bill was under consideration. I am now satisfied, from an examination of the papers before the Committee on Appropriations, that the appropriation ought to be made and therefore withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. This concludes the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSS. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill with amendments and with favorable recommendation to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments to its final passage.

Mr. VANDIVER. I gave notice, Mr. Speaker, of a motion to recommit the bill. Would it be now in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. VANDIVER. When would it be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the question at the proper time. It is not now in order.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois for the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. If there is not, the Chair will submit the question on the amendments in gross.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. A separate vote being demanded, the Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 1, of the bill, after the word "pay," insert the words "and allowances prescribed by law."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment just read.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 113, noes 22.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). One hundred and seventy-four gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, this is not dilatory, as it is demonstrated that a quorum is not present in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not so clear about it not being dilatory, but will submit the motion to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 105, answered "present" 18, not voting 159, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. FOX, and desire to be recorded as "present."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am paired with the gentlemen from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, and desire to be recorded as "present."

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to withdraw my vote and to be recorded as "present." I voted "aye."

Mr. ROBB. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. LLOYD, for five days, on account of serious illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. POWERS.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. RUPPERT.

Mr. NAPHEN. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WEAVER.

Mr. LAMB. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LANDIS.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the session:

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

Until further notice:

Mr. REEVES with Mr. SPARKMAN.

Mr. LANDIS with Mr. LAMB.

Mr. JETT with Mr. MANN.

Mr. PUGH with Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Until April 27:
Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana.
Until Tuesday next:
Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts with Mr. SULZER.
Mr. LOVERING with Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts.
Until next Thursday evening:
Mr. SULLOWAY with Mr. SALMON.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois with Mr. GRIGGS.
For the remainder of the day:
Mr. MUDD with Mr. WILSON of New York.
Mr. HEATWOLE with Mr. LEWIS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the House to be in order, so that business may be transacted.

Mr. FOSS. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

Mr. VANDIVER. Did the gentleman withdraw the motion to adjourn?

Mr. HOPKINS. We have just voted on that.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 12.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. DALZELL. The roll call has just displayed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There has been a vote since that.

The SPEAKER. Although in grave doubt, thinking it ought to be ruled out as dilatory while the last roll call displayed a quorum, gentlemen are very apt to have left at this hour, and therefore the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-seven gentlemen—not a quorum present.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the Chair will submit the following requests:

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 21, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

YAKIMA INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and accompanying papers, relative to the examination by Mr. E. C. Barnard, of the Geological Survey, of the disputed western boundary line of the Yakima Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IRRIGATION OF PIMA RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a report from the Director of the Geological Survey relative to the proposed plans for irrigation upon the Pima Indian Reservation, in Arizona; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like information as to what committee this communication shall be sent.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The reply, I think, ought to be sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs; but I desire to say that the documents which are transmitted are already in the possession of that committee. The object of the resolution was to ascertain certain facts which do not appear by those documents, and I do not think the resolution has been fully answered by any means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication; with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 3465) to provide an American register for the steamship Garonne;

A bill (S. 3924) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Tallahatchie River in Tallahatchie County, Miss.; and

PURE-FOOD LEGISLATION—BAKING POWDERS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I present a paper from A. Cressy Morrison, secretary and treasurer of the American Baking Powder Association, on the subject of baking powders as affected by the proposed pure-food legislation now pending before Congress. I move that the paper be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. MONEY. I present a paper in the matter of the claim of the Cherokee Indians for moneys due them from the United States, under treaties and existing laws, as found by the accounting rendered in accordance with the agreement ratified by the act of Congress of March 3, 1893. I move that the paper be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 18th instant, proposing to appropriate $30,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to purchase and place upon the Black Hills Forest Reservation, in South Dakota, a herd of American buffalo, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3197) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2241) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia; and

A bill (S. 775) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, to report a bill to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States and to submit a report thereon.

The bill (S. 4300) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3240) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LEADVILLE, COLO.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4168) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of site and erection of a building thereon at Leadville, Colo., to report it with an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be put on its passage. It simply increases the limitation, and it is indorsed by the Treasury Department. The building can not be commenced until the increase is made.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "seventeen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the purchase of site and erection of building thereon for the accommodation of the post-office and United States land offices at the city of Leadville, in the State of Colorado, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $117,000, which sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost of such site and building to be erected thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the Naval Observatory bill (S. 2019) be printed for the use of the committee.

TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to interfere with the morning business sufficiently to ask the President of the Senate to lay before the Senate again the conference report which was considered on yesterday, so that we may have a vote and disagree to the report, if that is the sense of the Senate, in order that further action may be taken in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Can not the Senator withhold that request for a few moments, until the morning business is completed?

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose there will be no discussion of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was rejected.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment made by the House of Representatives and ask for a further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not think that ought to be done. This is a bill which the Senate passed. The House struck out the entire Senate bill and passed an entirely new measure, containing very much of the matter that was in the Senate provision. The bill is in the hands of the Senate; it is not in conference; and we can take up the bill in the Senate and amend the House amendment and return it to the House for their concurrence, and the conference thereby might be entirely obviated.

There are so many important provisions in the bill that this course ought to be pursued in connection with it, and in my opinion it is the quickest and easiest way to secure the passage of the bill into a law.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose there is only one course to pursue with reference to the conference report, and that is to agree to it or disagree to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We have disagreed to it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We have disagreed to it.

Mr. CULLOM. We have disagreed to it so far.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate insist on its disagreement and request a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair, and that, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] be substituted in his place.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, and Mr. MORGAN were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 4291) to constitute Durham, N. C., a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Pamlico, and to extend the privileges of the seventh section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1880, to said port; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 4292) for the relief of John S. Mann; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4293) for the relief of Alfred Ford, executor of Joseph T. Stout, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4294) granting an increase of pension to George M. Sinclair; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 4295) to refund certain duties collected in Porto Rico; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4296) granting an increase of pension to Frances S. Childs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4297) for the relief of James R. D. Morrison; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SULLIVAN introduced a bill (S. 4298) granting a pension to Charlotte Jones; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4299) granting a pension to John B. Stevenson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTUS. For my colleague [Mr. MORGAN], who is now unable to be in the Chamber, I introduce two bills, and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims, as follows:

A bill (S. 4301) for the relief of Mrs. Cassa Simpson; and

A bill (S. 4302) for the relief of the estate of Jack Holland, deceased.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (S. 4303) for the relief of the estate of John P. Caruthers, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 117) to furnish the daily and bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the governors of Alaska and Porto Rico for distribution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,500 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the forest conditions in the Southern Appalachian mountain region of western North Carolina and adjacent States, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEAR submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for erecting fireproof laboratory buildings for the use of the Department of Agriculture in the city of Washington, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500,000 for continuing improvement of Mississippi River from Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETER TARGARONA.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 to pay Peter Targarona, of Baltimore, Md., for steamboat Live Oak, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1676) for the payment of certain claims; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment relative to the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and the payments provided for by the act of August 30, 1890, for the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and mechanical arts, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 17) to provide free homes on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserve the public lands for that purpose; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FLAGS OF MARITIME NATIONS.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed 10,000 copies of the document known as "Flags of Maritime Nations," under the supervision of the Bureau of Equipment of the Navy Department, with all necessary corrections and changes; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 for distribution by the Secretary of the Navy.

JORGE CRUZ.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement of the action taken by him in the case of Jorge Cruz, a resident of Porto Rico, alleged to have been brought into this country under a contract of labor in the United States, to which his attention was called by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury on April 5, 1900; and what steps, if any, have been taken or are in contemplation looking to proceedings against either the said Jorge Crus or the party bringing him into the United States.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator may perhaps like to have added to the resolution that the Attorney-General shall state the facts within his knowledge of such case.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was a response by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then that perhaps answers my suggestion.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes; I think it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMISSIONS APPOINTED BY THE EXECUTIVE.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate, first, what commissions have been created or appointed by the Executive, or under his authority, since March 4, 1897, in reference to the foreign relations or the Territories of the United States or to inquire into the conduct of the late war with Spain; second, the names of the persons composing each of said commissions; third, the total compensation paid each of said commissioners; fourth, the total compensation paid each of the secretaries, clerks, and other employees of each of said commissions, and fifth, the total traveling, incidental, and other expenses of each of said commissions.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let that go over for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

MOSES F. WOODS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3216) granting an increase of pension to Moses F. Woods, and that the bill be postponed indefinitely, a House bill of the same character having become a law.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CUBA AND PORTO RICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BACON, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to the Senate the following information:

First. Whether any officer of the Army of the United States who is now, or who has been, on duty either in Cuba or Porto Rico since the date of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain has had furnished to him by any person or authority any quarters other than such quarters as such officer is entitled under the law to receive. If so, what is the name and rank of each officer so furnished with such quarters and what quarters in each such instance have been so furnished.

Second. What rent has been paid in each instance for quarters thus furnished to officers of the Army during said period either in Cuba or in Porto Rico.

Third. What amounts have been expended in each instance in repairing, refitting, or improving any quarters occupied by any officer of the United States Army on duty in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, and for which officer in each instance was such quarters thus repaired, refitted, and improved.

Fourth. What amounts have been expended in each instance in furnishing or decorating any quarters occupied by any officer of the United States Army in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, what was the character of such furnishings and decorations, and for which officer, in each instance, were the quarters thus furnished and decorated.

Fifth. What amounts have been expended for horses or mules, harness, vehicles, or equipages of any kind to be used by any officer of the United States Army on duty in Cuba or Porto Rico during said period, and for which officer, in each instance, were the horses, mules, harness, vehicles, or other equipages furnished.

Sixth. What amounts have been paid for the hire of servants or as compensation for services rendered in and about the quarters of any officer of the United States Army during said period in Cuba or Porto Rico, and in each instance who was the officer occupying said quarters in and about which said servants were employed or said services were rendered.

Seventh. What amounts have been paid for supplies of any kind furnished to any officer of the United States Army during said period in Cuba or Porto Rico other than the allowances to which such officer is entitled under the law, and in each instance who is the officer thus receiving such supplies.

Eighth. In each of the expenditures concerning which inquiry is made, out of what fund was said amount paid.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, that was the second resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. That is true, but in some way it was numbered so that the second one was made to precede the first.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the one offered first be taken up first.

Mr. BACON. Before the resolution just read is laid aside, I desire to call attention to line 2, on page 2. The word "was" should be "were." I ask that it may be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made. The first resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BACON, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to report to the Senate the following information:

First. Whether any officer of the Army of the United States who is now, or who has been, on duty either in Cuba or Porto Rico since the date of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain has received any compensation for any service of any kind whatsoever other than the compensation to which such officer of the Army is, as such, entitled by law to receive as his salary and allowances.

Second. If any officer of the United States Army has during said period, while on duty in either Cuba or Porto Rico, received from any source any compensation other than that which he is, as such officer, entitled by law to receive as his salary and allowances, what is the name and rank of each such officer, and what the amount or amounts received by him, the date or dates on which each of said amounts was so received, on what account the said amount or amounts were paid, by whom said payment or payments were authorized, and out of what fund or funds said payments were made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution read just previous to this one?

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I be allowed a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive further morning business.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make just simply a three-line statement. This subject is substantially covered by Document No. 177, a report made last February. I do not object to the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was declared agreed to. Does the Senator desire a reconsideration?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not desire to open any discussion or make any amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. As the Senator has called attention to this document, I wish to make a very few remarks in regard to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What document is it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Senate Document——

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the passage of the last resolution be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. What I requested was that the vote on the second resolution of the Senator from Georgia be reconsidered, so that the Senator from South Dakota may make the statement he desires to make, and I also would like to have the Senator from Connecticut make his statement, which was not, I think, heard by the Reporters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote is reconsidered by which the second resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Connecticut to say that the information called for by the resolution of the Senator from Georgia was covered by Document No. 177, of February 16, 1900. I wish to say with regard to that document that on the 17th of January, I think, I introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information. I will read the resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate an itemized statement of public receipts from taxation, customs, and all other sources, collected in Cuba, and also of public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses, in Cuba, out of revenues so collected since the United States Government assumed control of that island.

This resolution passed the Senate on the 17th of last January. I offered the resolution because I had, I believed, accurate information that we were paying very large salaries to the Army officers in that country and great sums of money were being expended in beautifying and enlarging the palaces in which our officers lived; that expensive carriages, horses, etc., were had, and that our officers were living in as regal a style as the officers of Spain who had previously lived in that country.

The Secretary of War on the 15th of February sent in this statement. I have examined it many times, and had intended to take the subject up again, for the reason that the Secretary of War did not answer my resolution. Neither does he reply giving information about the salaries paid to our Army officers and their incidental expenses, but the document contains a mass of figures that give no information whatever. If this is all there is in the way of bookkeeping in connection with the affairs of Cuba, the situation there can be as bad as it is possible to imagine, and no one can ever find it out.

For instance, the Secretary of War takes up the subject of customs at each of the different ports. It makes no difference which port you take, they are all alike. He gives the receipts at the ports. Then he gives, to offset that:

By salaries for July, $515.

This is one of the small ports where the total receipts were $8,712.59.

By miscellaneous expenditures, $25.
By refund of tonnage dues, $298.40.
Balance due United States military government of the island of Cuba, $7,874.19.

And that is approved. Then it is approved again, and that statement is repeated two or three times, as it passed through the hands of different officers, I suppose. Then there is a certificate that some one has examined the accounts and it is again approved. Then the number of vessels that entered the port is given, the receipts from customs are again given, the expenditure for customs receipts, and these are given in the aggregate, nothing specific, nothing to designate how much salary was paid to any one individual. So every statement with regard to customs dues at every point in Cuba is the same in this document, and there are many pages of it—104 pages, I think. Then come receipts and disbursements for July, 1899, United States military government of Cuba in account with Maj. E. F. Ladd, treasurer of the island of Cuba, at Havana, Cuba, during the month of July, 1899. Then it gives the total amount that he received; tells from what sources the revenue came—customs receipts, postal receipts, internal-revenue receipts, miscellaneous receipts; total, $2,135,000. Then it tells the names of the individuals from whom this money was received.

Then comes an abstract of accountable warrants paid by the treasurer of the island of Cuba during the month of July, and that gives the names of the people to whom it was paid, but in block sums, to Maj. William Black, Habana, in all $206,000.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. For what?

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is what he has received. It does not tell for what. I suppose he was the disbursing officer and expended these funds—the accountable warrants paid by the treasurer of the island of Cuba during the month of August. This is for another month. I happen to notice a large sum here. Walter F. Smith, Habana, for customs receipts, $179,000.

So the sums are all aggregate sums, and there is no detail whatever as to the expenditure. There are pages of items of that sort. I presume there are somewhere accounts which would give the details of these expenditures. The Senate asked for this information specifically:

Also all public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses in Cuba out of the revenues, etc.

But we did not get the information. It is simply a part of the general policy pursued by the Administration in connection with all our relations with these islands, to conceal, to refuse to furnish information, to refuse to answer our resolutions when sent. When the Senate does not send our resolutions to a committee and bury them there, they go to the President or the Departments, and they are not answered.

Now, I defy anyone to take this report and find anything about these expenditures. I find, for instance, on page 118 the following:

Name and designations of officer.

One of the items on this page is "Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, commanding general, Santiago," under the head "Aid to destitute," $200 asked for and $200 allowed, and then in the column of totals, $101,845.

There are different headings here, "Customs service," "Department of state and government," "Department of finance," "Agriculture, public works, etc.," "Postal service," "Total."

Now, there is nothing under any of those heads, only the $200 for the relief of destitution, and then the total of $101,845, and half of the pages are the same. There are hundreds of thousands of dollars. I notice an item, Maj. William M. Black, chief engineer, Habana, $206,000, the total asked for, $206,000 allowed. There is no statement as to what it was asked for or what it was expended for. There are hundreds of thousands, I think a million, dollars on that page in the same category, and so on through all these pages, any number of items and no information at all that was asked for by the resolution.

I hope we shall be more successful in the resolution which we have just passed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] had the floor prior to this time. I beg his pardon for having addressed the Chair in view of his desire to submit his remarks. I will yield to him.

Mr. HAWLEY. It really does not make much difference, because we are both in the same search this morning; we are seeking information, and will be glad to get it.

Mr. CARTER. I supposed the Senator had concluded his remarks.

Mr. HAWLEY. I had not said anything until after the resolution was adopted, and then I asked leave to make a little explanatory statement. I perhaps gave more force to this document than it was entitled to. The Senator from South Dakota has read the resolution of the Senate adopted January 17:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate an itemized statement of public receipts from taxation, customs, and all other sources, collected in Cuba, and also of public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses, in Cuba, out of revenues so collected since the United States Government assumed control of that island.

I said that document would substantially answer the pending resolution, but on further looking at it I see that it is an unfinished document. I resent the altogether reckless and unsupported declaration of the Senator that it is the habitual way with this Government to refuse to give information. Every item down to a dime and a cent which pertains at all to this inquiry will be furnished as soon as possible. The Senator did not do the War Department the justice to read what I am now going to read:

Under the system of auditing established for the island of Cuba by Executive order dated May 8, 1899, pursuant to conference between the Treasury Department and the War Department, the accounts of public receipts and expenditures of funds of that island have been audited by officers appointed by the President, having their offices in Cuba and reporting the results of their work to this Department in form similar to reports of the Auditor for the Treasury Department to the Secretary of the Treasury. If an itemized statement in greater detail than is shown in the inclosed copies of reports and certificates is desired, recourse must be had to the accounts kept in Cuba.

A copy of the resolution of the Senate of January 17 has been forwarded to the military governor of Cuba with a direction that such a detailed statement be prepared, and that without awaiting the completion of such full detailed statement, a statement showing the salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses be prepared and transmitted to this Department, when it will be forwarded to the Senate.

It will be given—all this information will be cheerfully given as fast as it can be prepared. If there have been errors of judgment, then it will be frankly acknowledged and frankly set forth. If there be anything in the nature of fraud or willful violation of the statute, it will be reported. We conceal nothing.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish simply to say that it is three months since my resolution passed the Senate. It is two months and six days since this report came from the Secretary of War. I want to say further that I offered several resolutions of inquiry with regard to the conduct of affairs in the Philippines, and that a substitute resolution was afterwards passed by the Senate and supposed to cover everything. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] informed us that it would cover everything, and that we would get all the information we desired.

For instance, I asked whether after the fighting had commenced in the Philippines, on the next day after, Aguinaldo had not sent word to General Otis that he desired to stop fighting; that he would agree to a neutral zone, any zone Otis would state, and that Otis replied, "Fighting having commenced, it must go on to the grim end." That question remains unanswered. I asked whether such a reply was sent or not, and whether it was sent by direction from the President. I have had no reply. I could go on and enumerate five—I think six—decidedly important inquiries for which no reply has been furnished by the Department; and I say that this reply to my resolution of January 17 is in accordance with the general policy of concealment or refusal to furnish information adopted by the Administration.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will you allow me just a remark?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. Just for a remark or two in regard to this matter that is pending.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to address the Senate very briefly on this matter.

Mr. STEWART. If you are going to address the Senate on this same matter——

Mr. CARTER. On this same matter.

Mr. STEWART. All right.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it appears by the resolution which was adopted by the Senate in January last, and responded to on the 15th of February, about all the general information contemplated by the two resolutions adopted this morning has been, or will be, furnished.

The Secretary of War, in his communication transmitting a reply to the resolution of the 17th of January, announces what the report transmitted shows and what it does not show and the reasons why it is incomplete.

It appears from this statement that the War and Treasury Departments, as a matter of business regulation, concluded that it would be an unnecessary work to transmit duplicates to Washington City, to be here recorded in the permanent books of the Government, of each and every item, voucher, and fact connected with accounts in Cuba. It was manifestly necessary to make up accounts in Cuba that would be complete in themselves; accounts that could be transmitted to any government hereafter established and be fully and completely self-explanatory. It was arranged that a transcript of these accounts should be transmitted to the War and Treasury Departments here, to the end that the Government might be generally advised of the financial operations in the island, precisely upon the same principle that the Secretary of our Treasury becomes advised of general financial operations through the reports of the Auditor made to him from time to time.

The Secretary of War, in response to the resolution of January 17, transmitted to Congress very promptly, on the 15th of February, a full and complete showing of all the abstracts of accounts filed in the War Department from the time the Army began to administer the government of Cuba up to the date named in the resolution. There can be no pretense that there is a single fact omitted from this record that can be shown or is to be found in the War Department; but the Secretary of War in his report says that the statement according to the demand of the resolution is not complete. He is perfectly frank in saying so; and he sets forth the reasons in very clear and distinct language in the last two paragraphs of his communication read, I believe, in part by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. His letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 15, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report, in response to the following resolution of the Senate of the United States, dated the 17th ultimo:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate an itemized statement of public receipts from taxation, customs, and all other sources, collected in Cuba, and also of public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses, in Cuba, out of revenues so collected since the United States Government assumed control of that island."

The statement shows the receipts from customs, postal service, internal revenue, and miscellaneous sources from the date of the occupation of Cuba by the military forces of this Government, January 1, 1899, to December 31, 1899. The expenditures from January 1, 1899, to June 30, 1899, were made for the purpose therein specified from funds allotted by the Governor-General to the division of Cuba and the military departments. The disbursements from July 1, 1899, to December 31, 1899, appear in the statement as made from allotment of funds to cities and provinces, showing for what purposes in said cities and provinces such disbursements were made.

The salaries paid to officials and employees connected with the administration of the government of Cuba, and the incidental expenses thereof, are included in the items of expenditures from the allotments for the several branches of the government specified.

The original sources from which the information contained in the report herewith was compiled are shown in the inclosed copies of reports and certificates of the treasurer and the auditor of Cuba, covering the receipt, disbursement, and audit of revenues during the year 1899, and are more particularly described in the memorandum of inclosures hereto attached.

Under the system of auditing established for the island of Cuba by Executive order dated May 8, 1899, pursuant to conference between the Treasury Department and the War Department, the accounts of public receipts and expenditures of funds of that island have been audited by officers appointed by the President, having their offices in Cuba and reporting the results of their work to this Department in form similar to reports of the Auditor for the Treasury Department to the Secretary of the Treasury. If an itemized statement in greater detail than is shown in the inclosed copies of reports and certificates is desired, recourse must be had to the accounts kept in Cuba.

A copy of the resolution of the Senate of January 17 has been forwarded to the military governor of Cuba with a direction that such a detailed statement be prepared, and that, without awaiting the completion of such full detailed statement, a statement showing the salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses be prepared and transmitted to this Department, when it will be forwarded to the Senate.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
United States Senate.

Mr. President, I took occasion to call at the War Department this morning, and there found that they had received yesterday, or possibly this morning, through the mail, four volumes written up in response to this resolution, four bound volumes of written matter, containing a transcript of the accounts in detail as kept in the various divisions and subdivisions in Cuba; and these accounts will doubtless be transmitted here during the day or during next week, when the proper entries can be made in the regular course of business in the War Department. That supplemental report will show in detail what the records of the War Department did not show on the 15th of February, and what they were never intended to show in the light of the system of accounting to which I have referred.

Reference has been made to salaries and to the improvement of buildings in Cuba. I presume the resolution presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and perhaps that of the 17th of January, were framed upon the theory that double salaries are being paid officers of the United States Army. Such is not the fact. The truth is that when we assumed the functions and responsibilities of government in Cuba we assigned Army officers to discharge civil duties for the time being. These Army officers, receiving meager salaries, such as may be sufficient to maintain them at the ordinary military posts, were suddenly thrust into situations where greater expenses were of necessity incurred. One officer, I think, writing the War Department, said that for a time he had kept his family up in the States, until he found that he could not maintain them there any longer, paying his own necessary expenses and the expenses incident to his office as well. Thereupon he removed his family down to Cuba and tried to keep them in a hotel, but could not discharge his ordinary expenses and the expenses that came to him because of these civil duties and keep his family in that manner.

So he finally rented a house in an outlying quarter of the city and endeavored to live there within his salary; but he could not pay the butcher's bill and keep up the ordinary expenses incident to living, not because of his duties as an Army officer, but because the position into which he had been ordered brought with it expenses and obligations arising from day to day in hundreds of ways to absorb his entire salary. Thereupon the officer said, "I must be relieved from this; I am being fined here and punished for discharging these duties. Now, let the War Department do as it pleases; order me elsewhere, anywhere, to go into action in the line of duty, or else make some allowance to defray the expenses that are incident to and inseparable from this post which I have been ordered to fill."

Considering these facts and the reasonableness of this suggestion, and desiring to continue competent officers in charge without actually punishing them for being in charge, after full and fair consideration, I think it will appear that the governor of Cuba was allowed $7,500 per annum to defray the contingent expenses of his office, the governor of Habana $5,000 per annum, the treasurer $1,800, the collector $1,800, and the auditor $1,800.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was there any law obligating those officers to pay these expenses out of their salaries? Was it not a purely voluntary matter? If there is any law that obligated the officers to make these expenditures, I should like the Senator to read it.

Mr. CARTER. Well, Mr. President, there are hundreds of expenses attaching to official station which are not compulsory, and yet which no gentleman can avoid, evade, or refuse to meet.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what they are.

Mr. CARTER. For instance, Mr. President, I believe that the governor of Cuba, by the force of circumstances put into the palace where his predecessors had lived, was compelled to meet expenses in connection with living there, entertaining people from the United States and from various parts of the island of Cuba, which expenses he could not, as a gentleman and an officer of the Army of the United States, refuse to meet as ordinary hospitalities extended by virtue of his office.

It might be said that there is no obligation on the President of the United States, fixed by law, to give the regular official dinners that have been given, and are being given now, and will continue to be given to Congress, to the Supreme Court, and to the diplomatic corps. There is no law compelling that at all, and yet the salary of the President of the United States has been fixed with some regard to the fact that these social amenities are inseparable from the official life he lives.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the salaries of these officers have been fixed with reference to their situation and limited, just as the salary of the President is limited. They had no more right to go beyond their salaries than the President would have a right to go beyond his salary.

Mr. CARTER. No right; nor would there be any demand if these officers were continued in the discharge of the duties strictly appertaining to their military work. At a military post anywhere in the United States officers have free rent and live in a simple manner. In the social life of the military post the demands are few. But looking to the responsible duty of governing the island of Cuba the ordinary amenities of life and social relations had to be considered as unavoidable incidents attached to the office, and not to be paid out of the meager salary of the Army officer temporarily assigned to fill it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator has referred to the letter of some officer stating that it was impossible for him to live in Cuba upon his salary. I think I know the case. The officer asked for an increase and received it—an allowance of $1,800. He is an officer who has until within the last four or five years never served east of the Missouri River. He served as a lieutenant west of that river ever since his graduation. I happened to see something of him there. He has a family, a wife and children; and anyone who could see the requirements would know that it was impossible for him to live upon his salary, and that he was running in debt very largely every year. The allowance he asked for was a very moderate one. Another officer was allowed an increase of $3,500. It is proper perhaps to say that he was collector of the island of Cuba—not merely of the port of Habana, but of the island of Cuba. He was allowed an increase of $3,500. He asked to have it reduced, stating that he did not require so much; and he accepted but $1,800, the same as the treasurer of the island.

Mr. DANIEL. Was there any authority of law for that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there any law that prevents it?

Mr. CARTER. I was not discussing that phase of the matter, but there is no law preventing it. There was no pretense that this was an increase of salary to any officer; it was an allowance temporarily attached to the place while occupied by an officer and an income from the government there. His salary was never intended to be diverted or absorbed by such functions or responsibilities as these various offices place upon the person occupying them for the time being.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I like to hear this kind of a discussion going on, but it occurs to me the whole of it is entirely premature. It is trying the case before the evidence is in. Had we not better wait until the resolution is answered and the facts presented, so that those of us who want to have something to say on the other side will be on an equality with our brethren who have gone to the War Department and got the inside track?

Mr. CHANDLER. How can the Senator be "on the other side" before he gets the facts? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I have always been on the other side from the Senator from New Hampshire, except in the case of the armor trust and some other steals; and I hope he will line up against this steal when the time comes.

Mr. STEWART. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. It is manifest, and there can be no doubt, that the President, while Cuba is under military rule, is the sole judge of what shall be expended there by those appointed by him. They have to make rules and regulations to carry out the government under military law.

Now, here is an officer put in charge to administer the affairs of that country; and when he is put there he is to look after various departments of its government. It is necessary that he should fit up proper offices. It has been suggested that a palace has been fitted up. It is no part of the duty of an officer at his own expense to fit up those palaces to be used for government purposes. These additional expenses grow out of military rule and are independent of the salary of the officer; and so they come within the discretion of the Executive. The salary of an officer as such can not be increased unless there be some law for it; that is, if it is for his particular services as a military officer; but where he incurs additional expense in connection with renting a building for government purposes, it is proper that an allowance should be made to an officer under those circumstances.

The expenses at the White House are more than twice as much, yes, three or four times as much, as the salary appropriated every year.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me there

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Appropriations are made by act of Congress for the executive expenditures of the White House. Does the Senator say that the President can take whatever money is collected from the revenue in Cuba and make any disposition of it or give it to anybody he wants to? Is that the proposition?

Mr. STEWART. No, no.

Mr. BERRY. I understood the Senator to say that it rested solely with the President.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no. I am entirely misunderstood. I say he can take the revenue of Cuba and administer the government of Cuba, and repair buildings where they have been injured or torn down. Anything that is necessary to be done can be done to carry on that government under military rule, and the President does not have to come to Congress for appropriations to carry on the civil government of Cuba. That is not the business of Congress. That is the business of the military ruler, of the Executive. All those things are done, and they do not come to Congress. We do not have control of that money at all. That money is administered by the military authorities.

Now, when you come to the mere salary, independent of the government of Cuba, the salary ought to be that allowed by law; but we do not make appropriations of the Cuban money. It is administered by the War Department, by the President.

I have made these remarks that a false impression may not go out that palaces have been put up for the officers. They have been merely fitted up for the carrying on of that government. Those old buildings have to be overhauled for use as public buildings and fitted up for the administration of the local government there; and the military officer is not to be charged with the expense of it.

Mr. VEST. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to call his attention to a statement here—it may be absolutely false, but it is stated in one of the Washington papers of this morning, a reputable paper—that the Secretary of War, in answer to the direct question asked by the reporter of that paper, "Have you given additional salaries or have they been paid to military officers in the island of Cuba?" stated, "Yes; and stated amounts from five to eight thousand dollars a year"—not to fit up palaces, nor to furnish provisions, but to pay additional salaries.

Mr. STEWART. That may be for services or for the carrying on of that government, but we had better get a full report before we charge to the officers those expenditures which do not legitimately come under the military rule of that country.

Mr. CARTER and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. STEWART. I am through.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I lost the floor by yielding to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] or not, but I desire to make one statement before concluding.

Mr. BACON. I thought the Senator had made a complete speech and yielded the floor, as several others had intervened.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the speech was quite complete.

Mr. BACON. I will not trespass on the Senator's time if he has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Montana had yielded the floor.

Mr. CARTER. I had not.

There have been no additional salaries, but, as I have stated heretofore, there were mere allowances by the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army, for expenses connected with the administration of the government of Cuba while held under military control. The island being for the time in our possession, but still a foreign country, and the President being there in supreme command, answerable in a measure to Congress, but not disposing of any money over which Congress has direct control, his order making allowances for government expenses was proper. This money is not appropriated from the Treasury of the United States nor paid from the revenues of the United States. It is an allowance made from the revenues of the island of Cuba during the military occupation to meet the expenses of office incurred in the administration of that government. No doubt there have been some repairs of buildings. I have been informed that regard to ordinary sanitary requirements demanded that certain repairs should be made; that certain plumbing should be perfected; that the buildings should be put in habitable condition according to our theories of life; and much has been expended not only about the buildings, but in the streets of Habana and Santiago as well, in attempting to bring about such sanitary conditions as will forever expel, we hope, the constant recurring visitations of the yellow fever and kindred plagues.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. CARTER. In one moment I will yield the floor.

These expenses connected with the administration of the government by these officers and allowed to them for expenses, and for that purpose only, are as fully authorized and as clearly legitimate as the expenses incurred and the amounts paid to improve the sewerage of the city of Habana or the sewerage of the city of Santiago, or to make any other provision necessary for the betterment of the country or the preservation of the health of the people.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the two resolutions before the Senate this morning were each of them adopted, and my attention having been withdrawn——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One of the resolutions has been reconsidered.

Mr. BACON. I was about to inquire which one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One resolution was reconsidered for the purpose of making legitimate this discussion.

Mr. BACON. I am very glad to have the Chair inform me as to what the purpose of the reconsideration was, for I have been unable from the discussion to ascertain.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say that the Senator left his seat after having accomplished the passage of the two resolutions. I sent for the Senator to come back, and went to him and explained that I had asked that the passage of the second resolution should be reconsidered, so that it might be discussed by two Senators who desired to discuss it. The Senator from Georgia thought I did wrong, because he said he greatly preferred to have the debate after the passage of the resolution rather than before its passage. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. According to the very common custom of the Senate, in which the Senator from New Hampshire has very frequently distinguished himself.

I understand the question before the Senate is still upon the adoption of the resolution, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the adoption of resolution No. 278.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir. Mr. President, I have not heard anything said by any Senator which would indicate that the Senate should fail to again adopt the resolution. This is not, in my judgment, the proper time to discuss questions which may be raised upon the reply of the Secretary of War, for the reason that we have not the information upon which to base arguments upon those questions.

I do not think, Mr. President, that the fact that a resolution has previously been adopted by the Senate—the one offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], to which reply has been made by the Secretary of War—in any manner relieves the situation of the importance of the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate.

Here is a voluminous report of the Secretary of War, in reply to the resolution introduced by the Senator from South Dakota, in which there are long and complicated accounts, showing what moneys have been received, and in general the disposition which has been made of those moneys in Cuba. But from this report, Mr. President, it is impossible to secure the information which is sought by the inquiry contained in the present resolution. I will illustrate: The resolution now before the Senate calls for information as to what quarters have been furnished to different officers of the Army other than those which were authorized by law as their proper allowance; what amounts have been expended in repairing, refitting, and decorating those quarters; what amounts have been expended for horses and mules and carriages and equipages of various kinds; what amounts have been expended for services rendered by those who attend upon the officers engaged in this work in Cuba, etc.

Now, to give you an idea, Mr. President, of how far that information can be gathered from the reply which has already been made by the Secretary of War in his report—and I am very frank to confess that I have it in my hands this morning for the first time—I turn to page 107 of the report, on which is a summary. This will give an idea of the character of the reply, accurate doubtless, but still failing to give the specific information which we wish, and which was not really inquired for in detail by the resolution heretofore adopted.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to say to the Senator that the resolution called for "public expenditures, including salaries paid to all officers and incidental expenses in Cuba." It seems to me that is very specific and definite; and we did not get a reply to it.

Mr. BACON. I shall not stop to discuss that question; and I do not wish the Senator from South Dakota to understand me as criticising his resolution. I simply say the resolution now before the Senate is more specific and more limited in its scope and that it covers more particularly the ground upon which we may desire information.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I would say that I think the resolution should pass. I believe the Senator has the right to have the Department tabulate for him specific and definite information on any particular point, although the general subject has been covered by a previous document.

Mr. BACON. On page 107 of the document to which I have been referring, Senate Document No. 177, which I now cite just to illustrate the point I am after, there is a statement of the receipts from customs from January 1, 1899, to December 31, 1899, in the island of Cuba:

RECEIPTS.

From customs	$15,011,089.24
From postal service	244,002.33
From internal revenue	787,592.19
From miscellaneous sources	303,331.41

Making a grand total of $16,346,015.17.

Mr. President, when it comes to the question of expenditures, they are stated in a general way. It may be all right, and I am not criticising them, but simply calling attention to the fact that this report does not give the specific information which I now desire. We have these items:

DISBURSEMENTS.

Barracks and quarters	$1,269,939.43
Sanitation	3,052,282.94
Rural police and administration	1,445,467.21
Public works, ports, etc	700,126.01
Charities and hospitals	625,783.53

Running clear through in that general way. Then comes the following:

Miscellaneous (includes internal revenue to June 30)	$640,329.48
Civil government	345,479.05
Municipalities	1,239,403.65
Aid to destitute	229,912.87
Quarantine	156,813.90
Customs service	810,802.31
State and government	690,334.04

And so on, Mr. President. I shall not stop to read it all.

It appears that over $16,000,000 was received during the year 1899 and that all of it has been expended excepting a balance of something over $2,000,000. It is impossible out of those large amounts, thus generally stated, for the Senate to gather the information sought in the various inquiries embraced in this resolution. It may be, Mr. President, that these have all been correctly expended. I have expressly disclaimed any allegation to the contrary.

As I stated on yesterday, these resolutions have been introduced by me in consequence of suggestions which have come from the opposite side of the Chamber; they have been introduced by me not upon any definite information which I have had, but with the positive disclaimer on my part that I had any such definite information. They have been introduced by me with a statement that, though the matter has been in my mind for some time, I should have preferred that the resolution should have come from the other side of the Chamber, because the fact that it comes from this side of the Chamber might be construed as having a partisan motive, and I thought it was a matter of too much importance to be limited within the scope of partisanship.

The time has not yet come to discuss the question as to whether or not the President of the United States has unlimited control, as the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, of all the money raised in Cuba in the administration of the government there, and that it is for him in his unlimited discretion to fix the amounts which shall be paid to various officers, and in what manner all the other amounts of money shall be distributed. But while it is true, Mr. President, that the time has not yet come for that discussion, it is most pertinent to be considered by the country at this time and by the Congress, when it is proposed by another bill here to turn over without limitation, without restraint, without definition in any way, except that it is without limit of power, the entire government of the Philippine Islands for an unlimited time—a government not yet framed; a government to be framed according to the will and discretion of the President of the United States without suggestion from Congress; a government to be officered as he may direct and determine; a government in which every officer is to be paid as the President of the United States may determine; a government in which the revenues, however vast, shall continue to be subject to the will of the President until Congress may be at some future time sufficiently emancipated from the influence of the Executive to take away from him this vast, unlimited power, even if he should be unwilling to surrender it.

Mr. President, if all we have heard to-day from the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Nevada is true, that it is within the unlimited power and discretion of the President of the United States to dispose of the revenues of Cuba without reference to any legislation by Congress and with no limitation upon his power and no limitation upon his discretion, it is a most important matter for us at this time to have thus definitely brought to our attention, because it may be necessary that it shall be seriously considered by us in the important legislation which is now immediately before us in connection with the Philippine Islands.

This question will come up when the report is received from the Secretary of War, and I have no doubt will then have the careful consideration of the Senate. I confess that I utterly disagree with the suggestion that the war power places in the President of the United States the unlimited and unconstrained right and power to collect what moneys he may see fit and then to disburse those moneys upon his unrestrained judgment; and although the matter is not now up for final determination, I do not think it can be too early in the progress of this matter to give dissent to the suggestion which has come from the Senator from Vermont, a former Secretary of War, and which has been uttered by other Senators upon the floor, that, in the face of a statute which expressly says that a military officer shall not receive money in addition to that which is allowed to him by law, the Executive, as a reward or compensation for the exercise of any other office, may, without reference to Congress, without suggestion to Congress that relief is needed, without appropriation by Congress or without authority from Congress, say that that statute shall be annulled and that the officer shall, by the authority of the executive department, receive a large addition to his salary.

Mr. President, if it be true that these officers were in the position where they were very much embarrassed by reason of the duties devolving upon them other than those of a military character, and if it be true that they should have had other allowances, to whom ought the appeal to have been made for such allowances, to the executive department, in the face of a statute directly forbidding it, or to the Congress, which had the right and the power to vary that statute in those particular cases if there was reason for it?

There is a precedent for that. The statute to which I have referred applies to the Engineer Commissioner of this District as well as to any other officer in the Army, and yet the Congress of the United States has authorized him to receive an addition to his salary. It was perfectly competent to bring to the attention of Congress, if need be, the fact that these officers were so situated that they were entitled to additional allowances, and whatever was proper in that matter Congress could do. But aside from the fact of the question of impropriety, it is a most dangerous thing that we should fall into the habit of the absolute disregard and ignoring of law and overriding law, both constitutional and statutory, whenever it may suit the purposes of those who above all others should be observant of and obedient to law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I think with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], as well as with every other Senator who has hitherto discussed this subject, that the discussion is premature, and that the Senate ought to wait until the resolution has been answered by the Secretary of War, and we have all the facts before us. Every resolution of the character of these resolutions carries with it a suggestion that something improper has been done, and although the introducer of the resolution disclaims making any charge, the resolution itself by its very terms always suggests that there is something improper that ought to be corrected or something concealed that ought to be brought to light. Usually it turns out when the resolution is answered that there was nothing to the suggestion or suspicion, and I have no doubt that when this resolution shall be fully answered, as it will be by the Secretary of War, it will appear that nothing improper has been done with reference to the expenses of the government of the island of Cuba, and that there is nothing which would call for rebuke or statutes to prevent in the future.

So it seems to me this is entirely premature. And yet it has been discussed, and as a great many statements have been made as to what can be done properly and what can not be done properly, with reference to the expenses of the government of the island of Cuba, I desire to say a word about it. This resolution seems to suggest two matters. First, that additional salaries to Army officers may have been paid during the time of their service in Cuba.

Mr. BACON. They are separate resolutions.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. These resolutions. There seems to be a suggestion in them that it is possible that Army officers have been paid larger salaries during their administration of affairs in Cuba than are allowed by law. I think it will be found that such is not the case in any single instance. The second suggestion seems to me that an Army officer, charged with government in the island of Cuba, under its military occupation, ought to pay all the expenses of the government out of his own pocket and his own salary. That is the argument here, so far as arguments have been adduced—that General Brooke, when he was made military governor of Cuba, and charged with the entire administration of government affairs in Cuba, ought to pay the expenses connected with the administration of those affairs out of his salary. And so with General Wood and the military officers who are serving under him as Governor-General of the island.

Now, it needs only a statement of the argument to refute it. Cuba is not in the United States. It is not a part of the United States. It does not even, in the language of the Constitution, which has been so often adverted to here, belong to the United States; and, under the resolution of intervention, it never is, so far as we know, to belong to the United States or to become a part of the United States. Certainly it is never to become a part of the United States until after a government by the people of Cuba is established there. What may happen after that no one knows, but Cuba is to all intents and purposes foreign territory to-day, held under military occupation by the law of belligerent right and affected indeed, so far as that may be affected at all, by the provisions of the treaty of Paris.

International law is very plain on this subject of military occupation. The military governor—really the President of the United States in this case—is supreme. It may not, perhaps, accord with our ideas of government, but such is the fact. The military governor in a foreign territory, while in military occupation and administering the government of that territory, is supreme, limited only by international law and the law of the country until it is changed. General Wood can recommend changes in the law in Cuba. The President can change those laws; and he has done it and is doing it and must do it. It arises out of the necessity of the situation. There is no other lawmaking power there. There is no other governing power there. There can be no other governing power there until a government is established by the people of Cuba and the island turned over to the people of Cuba as it was promised should be done in the fourth article of our intervention resolution.

Mr. President, that being so, there must be an entire government of the island of Cuba in all its affairs, as perfect and extensive as the government of the State of Virginia. All the affairs of the island of Cuba must be respected, and the government must reach throughout the entire extent of the island, throughout all its provinces, throughout all its municipalities. It must extend to every department of government. All that is by the law of nations and by inevitable necessity committed to the governor in general, supervised and directed by the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. It is no new law; it is no new practice. It was done by General Scott in Mexico. It is done and must be done by every military governor wherever a country is under military occupation.

Now, a government does not run itself, Mr. President. A government has expenses. Every government has expenses. The government of the District of Columbia costs money. The government of the State of Virginia or the State of Maryland costs money. Money has to be expended for governmental purposes, for all the expenses incidental to governmental purposes. And, as I said before, you can not expect the Governor-General of Cuba to pay those expenses incident to his office and the administration of government by him out of his own salary any more than you can expect the President of the United States, who is his superior and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, to pay all the expenses of the government of Cuba, direct and incidental, out of his own salary of $50,000 a year. So I hold that it is perfectly proper that allowances should be made to these military officers who have been put in control of the government of Cuba for all necessary expenses, direct or incidental, and all such expenses as are befitting to the office which they administer.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the Senator to state that in the face of a statute of the United States which prohibits a military officer from receiving more than one salary, and that fixed by law, he can, because in a foreign country, receive another salary from any source whatever?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; not at all. I said it would appear that his salary had not been increased, in my judgment; that no additional salary had been paid.

Mr. VEST. The Senator is taking for granted a fact which does not appear. I stated to the Senator from Nevada that all the intimation even that we have upon that subject is an alleged interview with the Secretary of War, in which he says that this Administration has authorized another salary in Cuba. Suppose it does turn out that that salary has been paid. Does the Senator say that that is in pursuance of law?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, sir.

Mr. VEST. I understand him now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Secretary of War has made no such statement; that what he said in that respect to the reporter has been misunderstood by the reporter, or incorrectly reported.

I do not know that I need say anything more. But government must be carried on, and it should be carried on, not in an extravagant manner. We have heard something said about regal extravagance. I apprehend it will be found that there has not been any regal extravagance in Cuba.

I apprehend it may be found that when General Brooke went to Cuba as Governor-General, if he desired to be recognized and respected by the people of Cuba as its Governor-General, he ought to live in the palace, as it is called, provided for the Governor-General, and where the Governor-General of Spain had lived, and that that palace was found to be in a most dilapidated and unsanitary condition, a condition in which no American citizen ought to be called upon to live, or in which he could live, and that consequently it was fitted up and repaired as the Government of the United States would repair a dilapidated building, or as the State of Connecticut or the State of New York would repair a dilapidated building. There have been no decorations there. There has been no extravagance there. I have been there myself. It will turn out that there has been no money for repairs expended on that building except such as were necessary to fit it for the decent residence and business offices of a Governor-General of the island of Cuba.

Senators, if they wish, can go into it all. They can inquire into all the plumbers' bills. They can inquire into all the whitewashers' bills. They can inquire as to the price of carpets, if any were put down. I believe none were. If the Senate of the United States thinks it advisable, every one of these items can be gone into. We can ascertain just how many servants General Wood had in the house; how much he paid his cook; how much his chambermaid was paid. We can go into all these items with reference to every official connected with the army and administration of government affairs in Cuba.

But the question and the only question is whether these allowances which have been made to Army officers, charged with the civil administration of the affairs of Cuba, have been proper and reasonable or whether they have been extravagant. If they have been extravagant, it ought not to have been so. If they have been extravagant, I shall be very glad to have had the attention of the Senate called to it, that it may be remedied in the future. But I do not know how it is going to be remedied by Congress. How is Congress to legislate for Cuba? What right has Congress to legislate for Cuba any more than for Canada?

Mr. DANIEL. Does not the Senator consider that acts of Congress control in Cuba?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Acts of Congress do not control in Cuba and can not control in Canada. It is foreign territory.

Mr. DANIEL. Do not the laws of the United States, as to the duties and emoluments of officers, apply whether they are in this country or not?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As to the emoluments of officers, yes; but as to what shall be done in Cuba, no, in my judgment. Cuba is under military authority, military occupation. That occupation is under the Executive authority and not under the legislative authority. How far Congress may restrain the Executive authority, how far Congress may direct it, is a question which it is not necessary to enter into here; but Congress can not legislate to lay customs duties in Cuba. Congress can not legislate to lay taxes in Cuba. Congress can not legislate to build public buildings in Cuba or to repair them.

Mr. DANIEL. Can it not appropriate for that purpose?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; in my judgment it can not.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not a part of the expenses of the Army and can not we appropriate for the expenses of the Army?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is just the difficulty under which Senators on the other side seem to labor.

Mr. DANIEL. Is it not a part of the expenses of the Army and of military occupation?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. DANIEL. What is it a part of the expenses of?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is a part of the expenses of the government of the island of Cuba.

Mr. DANIEL. Is not that our military government——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is a military government, and——

Mr. DANIEL. And under our authority?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not under the authority of Congress.

Mr. DANIEL. Did they not go there under the direction of Congress?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question, as the Senator has introduced this broad subject?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Congress authorized the President to intervene, and for that purpose to use the Army and Navy of the United States; and the Army and Navy of the United States went there under the command of the President of the United States. He was authorized by Congress to use the Army and Navy for the purposes of intervention.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has broadened out this discussion, and I therefore wish to ask him a question. Admitting that the power of Congress to-day as commander in chief of the Army and Navy in the military occupation of Cuba is unlimited, does the Senator hold that Congress can not pass laws regulating the conduct of the President and prescribing terms and conditions in connection with the military occupancy of Cuba?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is possible that the President's power is not absolutely unlimited; that is, that the Presidential power, the Executive power, is not absolutely beyond limitations which may be imposed upon it by Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator contend that Congress would not have the right to order the President to withdraw the Army and evacuate Cuba and leave it absolutely alone?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is one thing we can do.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is one thing.

Mr. TILLMAN. If we can do that, we can do anything less than that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think not. We have not conferred upon the President the right to be in Cuba. That power is conferred upon him when he is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. Of course we may say that he shall or shall not move the Army into Cuba, but when he moves it there and retains it there and holds occupation with it, it is clearly executive power which is being exercised.

Mr. DANIEL. It is the duty of the Executive to execute the law. The idea is that the Executive shall execute the law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Executive has power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy far beyond executing the laws of the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. Whence does he get that power?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He gets it from the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. The Senator said the President was there exercising Executive power. Is not the Senator in error; and is he not there as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy under the Government of the United States, and in pursuance of a war made by a resolution of Congress?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Undoubtedly in pursuance of an act of Congress.

Mr. BACON. And is he not there as Commander in Chief rather than as the Executive, because the Executive is the man who executes the law; the Commander in Chief is the man who makes war in pursuance of a resolution of Congress. Of course the supplemental question which I will propound now, so as not again to interrupt the Senator, is whether or not it is possible to conceive that under any form of government, either republican government or autocratic government, the commander in chief of the army can be less than the servant of the government and obedient to the orders of the government, whatever orders it may see fit to issue to him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am not going to draw nice distinctions—I do not think it is necessary that they should be drawn—as to whether the President is there under his power as Executive, or whether he is there under his power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. I do not recognize the distinction which the Senator from Georgia proposes to draw. I think that the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States is still the Executive. Our Government is divided into three branches—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. It is under the executive branch and not under the legislative branch, in my judgment, that we are in military occupation of the island of Cuba. I do not believe that Congress can levy tariff duties in the island of Cuba. I do not believe that it can levy taxes or collect them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do you think the President can do it?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not believe that it can establish suffrage in the island or direct election laws and registration laws. If we can, we can legislate for a foreign country.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator if he believes the President can do those things?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER. And that Congress can not by law regulate his exercise of those powers?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to say that I differ in toto with the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But we have drifted, Mr. President, far away from the original question. I did not intend to be drawn into the discussion which I have to some extent originated; certainly not at this time. But I desire to say that while it is true we can not increase the salary of an Army officer, I think there is no law whatever to prevent allowing to an Army officer connected with the military occupation of Cuba such reasonable and just expenses as the administration of the affairs of that island entail. If there is any law against that I should like to know what it is. And if there be any law which requires an Army officer to pay the expenses incident to his office—his office rent, for instance—out of his own salary as an officer, I should like to know where that law is.

Mr. DAVIS. While engaged in civil administration.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. While engaged in civil administration of the affairs of the island.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything on this subject, because I think it might be better discussed after we have had the information that is desired from the War Department, and which will no doubt be seasonably furnished us. But this is the first time I have heard the absolute doctrine of absolutism as existing in the Presidency of the United States asserted upon this floor, and it does not seem to me that such a doctrine ought to go unchallenged.

The President of the United States is given certain specific powers under the Constitution. Beyond that his great executive duty is to see that the laws shall be faithfully executed, and it is a new if not a purely original idea of the Senator from Connecticut that the President is so far beyond the laws of the United States that we can not direct what are his duties as a military officer in executing a specific order or a discretionary order that has been given him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not that the blossoming of the imperial idea?

Mr. DANIEL. It is not the blossoming of the imperial idea; it is its perfective and rotten fruit. It will fall from the tree of its own weight, and I trust it will be something to remind the people of this country of the fearful precipice on which they stand and remind them that they should be more careful than they have been in intrusting their lives, fortunes, and military destinies to illimitable Executive power.

The Army of the United States is an agency of this Government. It can exist for no moment except under the laws appointed for its government and guidance. It is true that those laws are to a degree elastic, but where they are specific they are absolute over the President of the United States and the General of the Army down to the humblest private in the ranks.

I am glad to see from the message of the President that he has not such a conception of his absolute powers to set aside or override or to be over the laws of Congress. On April 18 of this year he sent to Congress a message in regard to Porto Rico. Although that is foreign soil according to the doctrines of the Senator from Connecticut, he esteems that the laws of Congress as to the regulation of the duties of officers and the limitations upon those officers apply to them, and he says in his message with respect to officers in the Territory, or whatever it may be, of Porto Rico under the very peculiar legislation of this body:

That authority can not well be given at present by temporary appointments of the existing officers to positions under the act, for the reason that many of the existing officers are officers of the Army detailed to the performance of civil duties, and section 1222 of the Revised Statutes would prevent them from accepting such temporary appointments, under the penalty of losing their commissions.

So that at least we have it as to Porto Rico.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I understand what the Senator is going to ask, and I am going to meet it. We have that as to Porto Rico, about which we have legislated, and we have got it in a position in which it has come under the laws of Congress as applicable to its military officers.

Now, with respect to officers who are performing certain duties in Cuba of an official character in connection with the government which has been established in Cuba under military occupation, there is one thing that can certainly be alleged respecting them, that where acting as collector or in any other domestic capacity as to Cuba, they are acting officially and are performing official duties. That is one fact that we have.

We have a second fact, that they are either acting in a civil capacity or in a military capacity. I will take it that in Cuba, under military occupation and with a commander in chief of our Army, with the President of the United States as the chief executive officer, they are acting in a military capacity as officers of the United States, and that he has just such authority respecting them which is the necessary corollary of that position as the Commander in Chief has over officers of the United States. They are acting in military function, the very function for which they were appointed to act, the function which they are commissioned to act, the function which they are salaried to act in, the function in which they live, move, and have their being as military officers, wearing the insignia and discharging military duties imposed upon them by the laws of the United States. That being so, let us see what is the law of the United States as to their discharge of military functions. I shall ask leave to insert in the RECORD at this stage of my remarks section 1267 to section 1274 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 1267. In no case shall the pay of a colonel exceed $4,500 a year, or the pay of a lieutenant-colonel exceed $4,000 a year.

SEC. 1268. The sums hereinbefore allowed shall be paid in monthly payments by the paymaster.

SEC. 1269. No allowances shall be made to officers in addition to their pay except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 1270. Fuel, quarters, and forage may be furnished in kind to officers by the Quartermaster's Department according to law and regulations.

SEC. 1271. Forage in kind may be furnished to officers by the Quartermaster's Department as follows:

Major-general, for 5 horses.
Brigadier-general, for 4 horses.
Colonel, for 2 horses.
Lieutenant-colonel, for 2 horses.
Major, for 2 horses.
Captains and lieutenants, mounted, for 2 horses.
Adjutants and regimental quartermasters, for 2 horses.
Chaplains, for 2 horses.
Ordnance storekeeper and paymaster at Springfield Armory, for 2 horses.
All other storekeepers, for 2 horses.

SEC. 1272. Forage shall be allowed to officers only for horses authorized by law, and actually kept by them in service when on duty and at the place where they are on duty.

SEC. 1273. When any officer travels under orders, and is not furnished transportation by the Quartermaster's Department, or on a conveyance belonging to or chartered by the United States, he shall be allowed 10 cents a mile, and no more, for each mile actually traveled under such order, distances to be calculated according to the nearest post-routes; and no payment shall be made to any officer except by a paymaster of the Army.

SEC. 1274. Officers retired from active service shall receive 75 per cent of the pay of the rank upon which they are retired.

The statutes were passed after the experience which this country had acquired in the great civil war. As the result of that experience Congress legislated on this subject, the very subject which the Senator from Connecticut is discussing. It said in section 1267:

In no case shall the pay of a colonel exceed $4,500 a year, or the pay of a lieutenant-colonel exceed $4,000 a year.

Here, then, was an express interdict comprehending all cases of military service. How can anyone contend, in the face of such an interdict, that it is in the power of the President or of anybody except the Congress, which alone can make appropriations and direct what such pay shall be, to fix such allowance?

Then comes the provision as to their being payable in monthly installments, so that they shall receive their monthly allowance regularly. Then comes section 1269, not applying solely to pay, but which says:

No allowances shall be made to officers in addition to their pay except as hereinafter provided.

This section was passed on the 15th day of July, 1870. Did Congress have a right to fix the pay and allowance of these officers? Do they represent the people of the United States? Have they authority as their spokesman and as the sole custodian of their money to say where their money shall go? Does not the oath of the President of the United States to see that the laws are faithfully executed apply to this law as well as to any other law? Is there any place on earth, unless in some remote and partially civilized regions, where any chief of a nation, be he bey, sultan, or what not, has the right and power to override the express, specific enactment of the legislative body?

Then come the allowances which are authorized to officers—fuel, quarters, and forage; provision for five horses for a major-general, four for a brigadier-general, two for a colonel, two for a lieutenant-colonel, two for a major; captains and lieutenants, mounted, two; adjutants and regimental quartermasters, two; chaplains, two. Then comes a distinct provision as to the allowance of forage that there shall be allowed to officers, only for horses authorized by law. Then come the provisions for the traveling and the moving about of officers:

SEC. 1273. When any officer travels under orders, and is not furnished transportation by the Quartermaster's Department, or on a conveyance belonging to or chartered by the United States, he shall be allowed 10 cents a mile, and no more, for each mile actually traveled under such order, distances to be calculated according to the nearest post-routes; and no payment shall be made to any officer except by a paymaster of the Army.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not comment upon what has come to us either by newspaper report or by rumor and personal information, but there is no provision in these statutes for the furnishing of officers with transportation, with horses, with houses, or with anything else except according to law; and I deny that the President of the United States is above law. There is a law of public necessity.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] who is chairman of the committee, I ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

I desire to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have, as a body, been reproached because the Senate would not stick to what is known as the Quay case. The Senator from Pennsylvania has notified us more than once that unless we continue under the unanimous-consent agreement to debate the Quay case he would insist that when the time came a vote should be taken.

Now, this resolution with reference to offices in Cuba was not among the excepted subjects that were to be taken up and to shut out the Pennsylvania election case. I learn that the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] is desirous of proceeding to discuss the election case in support of the minority report, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], the chairman of the committee, is desirous of going on. Time is slipping by, and half a dozen Senators who desire to discuss that question from the other point of view, in favor of the majority report, are likely to lose any opportunity of discussing the question before the vote is taken. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not here. It has been stated that he is desirous of addressing the Senate at length upon the subject. In the meantime we are going on and spending the time upon other matters.

Following the example of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I give notice now that when the time comes I shall, if I deem it a desirable and wise thing, move to further postpone and dispense with action on the Pennsylvania case. But I hope in the meantime that Senators who are ready to speak upon the matter will go on, and that the Senator from California, as the resolution which has been before the Senate has gone over under the rules, will proceed to address the Senate so that we may have that case up and fully debated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Virginia may finish his remarks.

Mr. DANIEL. It will be but a few minutes longer, I will state to the Senator from Montana. I do not like to intrude upon any regular order; but I have some more remarks to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection is made.

Mr. HALE. I certainly shall object to the Senator from Montana, who has been alluded to by the Senator from Virginia, after the Senator from Virginia is through, bringing up anything except the Quay case.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Maine that it is not the intention of the Senator from Montana to either make remarks or present any business for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I shall bring my remarks to a hurried conclusion. I will simply say that officers of the United States who have had other duties than those which pertain strictly to their position with their regiments assigned them were acting either in a civil or in a military capacity. I believe that in the sense of our laws they were acting in a military capacity. It seems to me a very clear proposition that the provisions of the statute regulating their military duties and fixing their compensation for their action in a military capacity applies to them wherever they are, in any quarter of the world, under any and all circumstances.

Something has been said by the Senator from Connecticut as to the inability of officers to support themselves in Cuba with the salaries allowed them by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I beg the Senator's pardon, I did not say that.

Mr. DANIEL. If that were true, it would justify the President in sending a message to Congress informing them of that fact. It would justify a communication to Congress urging them to increase the salaries. But, in point of fact, I beg leave to say that just as soon as our forces were in occupation of Cuba and the ports were open, which was before the surrender at Habana, an American dollar went further in Cuba than it had ever gone before in the history of the world, for Spanish money, which had been used in Cuba, fell to an enormous discount. With one dollar an American could get about two of Spanish equivalents, and with those equivalents he could live cheaper in Cuba than in any city or town of the United States. I speak, Mr. President, whereof I do know, for I had an opportunity of several weeks' observation in Cuba, and there can be no extenuating excuse from the conditions of environment to mitigate a violation of law.

Now, if these officers were serving in a civil capacity, as the President regards those hereafter in Porto Rico, and as some might regard their functions at any time, they are then comprehended by section 1222, Revised Statutes, which says that—

> No officer of the Army on the active list shall hold any civil office, whether by election or appointment, and every such officer who accepts or exercises the functions of a civil office shall thereby cease to be an officer of the Army, and his commission shall be thereby vacated.

The Senator from Connecticut can take either horn of his dilemma he pleases. Either one is as fatal to the pretension of absolutism in any military officer of the United States, whether it be the President or the corporal of the guard, as he has set forth to-day. If the President is the absolute dispenser of the moneys of the Cuban people, and if he is under no obligation to support the laws which he has sworn to support, then any military officer who may have command in a particular province has the same authority as a military officer, in the absence of orders to the contrary, and his doctrine would remit this country to the most complete militarism and absolutism that the world has ever known.

When Mr. Jefferson was President he spent $10,000 in the discharge of the duties of his office more than the salary allowed him. He went home and mortgaged his property to pay it, as an honest man sworn to execute the laws should do.

I have no disposition, Mr. President, to indulge in any hypercriticism about the President of the United States or any of its servants. I should have said nothing upon this subject but for the extraordinary defense of things, which it was alleged had not been done, made by the Senator from Connecticut. It is a most extraordinary event when absolutism can find an open defender in the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the vote is taken, I wish to say a word, and I would rather say what I desire to say before the Senator from Georgia leaves the Chamber. Otherwise his resolution may not pass, and I think it due to him that it should be acted upon this afternoon.

I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that Cuba, being in military possession of the United States, the President, being the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, can make allowances for living expenses in his discretion to the Army officers now occupying that island. I do not think he can legally increase their salaries. When the answer comes from the Secretary of War to the resolution offered by the Senator from Georgia (which I hope will pass a second time to-day), I trust and believe it will appear that the allowances which have been made have been wise and discreet and proper allowances, with which no fault can be made.

The question of the decoration of officers' quarters is one about which there might be some differences of opinion as to what quarters should be decorated and what decoration is. When the humble colored man—using a word that I prefer to use when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] will allow me—when the humble colored man whitewashes his cabin it may not only conduce to health, but it may be called decoration. Paint is a decoration.

Mr. BACON. And tapestries.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Georgia might think if some of the public buildings in Cuba have been painted that that is decoration. We shall know about these things when the report comes in.

Mr. President, it is to be borne in mind with reference to these so-called palaces that many of them are very much inferior to the residences of American citizens in the present day. I doubt not that there is many a palace that is inferior to the humble residence of my friend the Senator from Georgia in Macon; and if he were to cause it to be painted and whitewashed, I do not think that I should consider it, if I visited him, as I hope to do at some time, necessarily a decoration of his home because he had painted and whitewashed it or even if he had papered it.

Mr. BACON. Whatever the Senator finds there, he may rest assured it will be done out of my own money and not that of the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, Mr. President, I have no doubt that that will be so.

So it will be found that all the decorations that have been made of the palaces in Cuba have been made by the money, not of the United States, but from the moneys collected in Cuba by the Army; and the buildings which have been decorated—that is to say, fumigated, cleaned, whitewashed, and painted in order to make them habitable—have been public buildings of Cuba, which, when the Cuban republic is established, will be the property of the people of Cuba.

Mr. President, I do not care how good a time General Brooke has had in the palace of the Governor-General of Cuba.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion right in that connection?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If I recollect aright, all of the officers whose hardships have been descanted upon here to-day, had their rank in the Army very materially raised in order that they might have the increased pay which would be necessary for such expenses as they would be called upon to meet, and the additional allowances in the face—I will not say in the face, but rather in recognition of the peremptory command of law—that an officer should have no allowances other than his pay.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, that may be; and yet the Senator knows that the expenses of our Army officers engaged in performing civil functions in Cuba have been very great, and I think the Senator will believe when the report is made that the allowances have been justifiable.

But I was speaking of the palace of the Governor-General, where, I suppose, that being a huge public building in Habana, possibly $75,000 may have been expended in putting it in good sanitary condition and making it a creditable public building. I say I do not care how good a time General Brooke and the other Army officers may have had in that building. I hope that the president of the Cuban republic will enjoy himself in that former Spanish palace; and I myself, if I were to give a vote for the next president of the Cuban republic, should vote for Gen. Maximo Gomez. I shall not regret the money which the military authorities of the United States have expended in putting that building in good condition, and I do not think my friend the Senator from Georgia will find fault about it when he knows exactly what has been done and the circumstances of the expenditure.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has not only shown very properly, as I conceive, that the President's power to make these allowances exists as a military power, but he has gone further and asserted that that military power can not be controlled by the legislation of Congress. I wish, without taking up too much time, to entirely dissent from that doctrine. I hold that any foreign territory, while it is in the military occupation of the United States, is subject to be controlled and governed as to that military occupancy by law passed by Congress and approved by the President, or, if not approved by the President, passed by a two-thirds vote over the veto of the President; and I can read the clause in the Constitution, which is before me, in but one way. It is the closing clause of that part of the Constitution which gives power to Congress, and it says that—

The Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Mr. President, that is the plainest possible language. There is no power which the President of the United States can exert, whether in the performance of civil functions or military functions, where he can not be controlled by laws made by the Congress of the United States.

I shall not detain the Senate by adding anything more on that point, except to enter my dissent from the doctrine stated by the Senator from Connecticut; and it gives me pleasure, in concluding, to find myself again in perfect accord with the Senator from South Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as the resolution is still before the Senate and will be voted on, notwithstanding the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, when the unfinished business ought to have come up, I beg the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I bring out two or three ideas that have occurred to me during this debate.

I think the debate was entirely premature. It would not have occurred but for the anxiety of our Republican friends to parry or cushion this blow, or rather to sugar coat this pill of imperialism, which the country has had this morning in the revelations in regard to this matter. They did not want the fact to go out in the Associated Press reports that the Secretary of War had acknowledged that he had been paying salaries and that there were numerous other expenditures of public funds, either Cuban funds or United States funds, that were unwarranted.

The point I wish to present to the Senate is this: That the argument which has been advanced here as a reason or as an excuse for this bad practice is that we must emulate Spain; that the Cubans have been accustomed to the grandeur and pomp of a Governor-General, just as the Porto Ricans are to be impressed on the 1st of May by a grand ceremonial and pageant in the inauguration of our new governor there, accompanied, as he will be, not at present, but a little later on, by a numerous and interesting lot of carpetbaggers from up here to administer the affairs of that island. The idea, I say, is that we must emulate Spain; that this Republic can not afford to do less in the way of pageantry and expenditure and pomp than the Spanish officers who have governed those people in the past. Well, I must say it is not agreeable to me that any such idea shall be put forward here as an explanation or apology why this kind of thing shall obtain.

We went to Cuba to kick Spain off of the Western Continent, to get rid of Spanish tyranny, to do away with Spanish misgovernment and robbery; and now, in view of the fact that we continue to remain there and stay there, and collect their revenues and expend them lavishly and extravagantly, the defense is put up that the reason for it is that the Cubans and the Porto Ricans have been accustomed to that kind of thing, and that we could do no less or we would lose the respect of those people.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] suggests that the Cubans and the Porto Ricans have been accustomed to misgovernment, to being robbed, to seeing their revenues wrenched from them at the point of the bayonet, and expended in this way; and for that very reason, Mr. President, that we should be trying to set those people an example of republican government—self-government, and economy, and decency—I do not see that that excuse will carry much weight with any right-thinking person.

Now, if I understand our situation in Cuba, we are there as trustees for the people of Cuba; we are there trying to bring order out of chaos; we are there trying to get a system of government which will give those people the right to control their own destinies; and it comes with bad grace, especially from the chairman of that committee who has Cuban affairs in charge, to get up here and apologize for this supposed exposure that is coming and try to explain it, to palliate it; and yet we are not told when we are going to get out of Cuba. The war will have been ended two years in July. We have had possession of that island since October a year ago—nineteen months; and yet there is no limitation upon the military occupation; no time fixed when we will turn the government over to those people; no intimation as to when this kind of government there is to end.

If anything is needed to arouse public opinion in the United States, to accelerate this leisurely movement of the President and his advisers in setting up the Cuban republic and turning it over to its own people, it is this exposure of the expenditures under the double rule of military officers performing civil functions, getting pay from the United States as Army officers and getting pay out of the Cuban treasury as civil officers. Those officers never will get away from there voluntarily if they can stay there and get double pay, double allowances, and have palaces to live in.

I have been to Habana; I do not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire has been or not; but I can tell him, while there might have been a scent of Spanish tyranny about the palace of the Governor-General that might need to be fumigated out or washed out with vitriol, otherwise I do not suppose that it needed any great amount of cleansing. I do not like the idea the Senator has advanced, that this expenditure of money was necessary merely for sanitary purposes. I suppose the Spaniards would have had the house about as clean as it will be when General Brooke leaves it or as it is now.

So far as servants are concerned, we all know military headquarters have such a practice of detailing orderlies and other private soldiers to do this, to do that, and to do the other, that all the cleansing about the camp is done by the troops. We have no idea here advanced, at least no proof, that the troops at Habana, the American soldiers, have not been the ones who have done this cleaning up. True, some expenditure may have been made for whitewashing, and I think the Republican party will need a considerable amount of whitewash before they will convince the American people that this proposition advanced here this morning is a right and a just one and one that they can sustain.

While I am on my feet discussing this question of our insular possessions, I want to call attention to another story, which I got from the newspapers a couple of days ago. I saw it stated that some contractor at Knoxville had received information that his bid to make roads in Porto Rico had been accepted and that he had a contract signed since we appropriated the $2,000,000 here the other day by which he was to build a 25-mile road and get $1,000,000 for it. I do not know whether the statement is true or not. I might have offered a resolution asking whether that has been done; but really I do not want to bother our friends over there with so many resolutions of inquiry. We will wait and see whether the information which comes under the resolution of the Senator from Georgia will give us enough to debate on in regard to this new imperial policy before we bring up the other proposition.

It was advanced in the debate on the resolution appropriating $2,000,000 back to Porto Rico that it was to relieve the starving people down there, to relieve them from the burden of taxation, and all that sort of thing. Now, in less than two weeks after we passed that bill, we have information that some contractor in Knoxville has got a contract to build a road and that $1,000,000 is to be expended in that way. I do not know whether it is true or not. The newspapers tell so many stories that have no foundation that we can not always rely upon them, but they generally tell the truth about the Republican party when attacking its policy. It is the Democrats only that they lie about these days. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Connecticut has left the Chamber, but I should like to have anyone on that side who belongs to the Committee on Insular Affairs and Cuba to give us some intimation as to when the American troops will be withdrawn, when they will leave Habana, or will turn over this $16,000,000 that we are told was collected there last year from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1899, to the Cuban people, and let them spend it in their own way, run their own government, and pay such salaries as they please. I think the American people will be very much delighted to know when our pledge to give those people absolute autonomy and turn the island over to them is to be redeemed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, it is three months since the resolution was passed by the Senate asking for this identical information, and the reply on the part of the Secretary of War that he has not the information is no reply that should satisfy the American people or the American Senate. We were furnished not with an answer to the resolution, but with a statement that the information was in Habana, or in Cuba, and that he would have to send there for it. Congress is in session and has been since December last, and yet information absolutely necessary and essential to proper action on our part is not only not furnished for three months, but we are told that the information is in Cuba. Is there no supervision over these officers on the part of the Administration by which they can ascertain whether this money is properly expended or not?

I see by the reply made by the President that this practice of taking revenues from one locality and spending them in another is not alone common to Cuba. A resolution was passed by the Senate on the 24th of January asking for a copy of the agreement made with the Sultan of Sulu, and also out of what revenues the salaries of the Sultan and his officers were paid. The agreement shows—and I hold in my hand the message of the President of February 1—that the Sultan of Sulu receives $250 a month; that his numerous datos, to the number of eight, receive $75 and $60 a month, one $50, another $40, and another $15. The President says:

I reply to the request in said resolution for further information that the payments of money provided for by the agreement will be made from the revenues of the Philippine Islands unless Congress shall otherwise direct.

It appears, then, in this case that the people of the Philippine Islands are being taxed to pay the salaries of another government in another group. It can not be urged that they are all one, because, if that were the case, then the government of the Sulu group, which is in treaty relations with us, must ultimately be extended over the whole group; and that must be what we are fighting for.

I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the President has a right to collect money in Luzon from the people of those islands and pay the salaries of the Sultan of Sulu and his inferior officers?

I did not intend by anything I said to cast any reflections upon the Army officers in Cuba. I know of nothing that they may have done that was improper. I do not know that anyone can blame them for receiving additional salaries if the Administration chooses to pay them. That question I have not discussed. Neither do I intend to impeach their motives or in any way to question their integrity; but it does seem to me that, after three months, we ought to be able to get at the facts in this connection. If the Administration waits as long to reply to the resolution of the Senator from Georgia as it did to the one of January 17, which I offered, Congress will undoubtedly have adjourned without receiving the information; and yet the President asks us to pass a resolution placing this entire power in his hands beyond all question after we adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, before that motion is put, in connection with what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has said, I desire to make a statement of my own personal knowledge in regard to contracts. I know that in Porto Rico, in the last part of 1899, when a contract was being let for the building of a public road in that island, there were bidders from several parts of this country. On the day before New Years, I think, of this year, the bid of a certain company in the State of Delaware was accepted; and before the representative of that company could get to the United States, the letting had been changed and the contract given to a New York company at a bid many thousand dollars above the bid of the company in the State of Delaware.

The only excuse given by the authorities for that change was that the Delaware company, the company which was the lowest bidder and to whom the award had been given, had not the amount of capital necessary to carry on the business of building the road, notwithstanding the fact that the most responsible financial companies in the State of Delaware agreed to guarantee the contract of that company. In addition to these guaranties was the indorsement of my late colleague here, Senator Gray, of Delaware. Notwithstanding that and my own protest, the contract was given to a bidder whose bid was many thousands of dollars above that of the company to whom it had been originally awarded.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What was the name of the company?

Mr. KENNEY. I can not give the name of the company, because I do not know it exactly; but it is a construction company in the city of Wilmington, of which I think John N. Carswell, the cashier of the Farmers' Bank, one of the strongest financial institutions in that State, was secretary or, possibly, treasurer. The other bidder was, I think, the Croton Construction Company, of New York City. I give this from memory. I am not sure about the name of the company, but the facts are as I have stated them.

Mr. TILLMAN. Did the Senator have any intimation that there was to be a political contribution to the campaign fund by the company whose bid was accepted?

Mr. KENNEY. I only know they came here stating that after the contract had been given to the Delaware company it had been taken from it and given to the other company. That is my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The resolution was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business before the Senate is the bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippines Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that that bill may go over until Monday, remaining the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the unfinished business may go over until Monday, retaining its position. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now ask that the Pennsylvania resolution may be continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution in relation to the seat in the Senate from the State of Pennsylvania is now before the Senate.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, so many questions have been discussed and so many resolutions have been presented that I ask for the reading of the resolution which is now before the Senate for consideration, on which I will make a few brief remarks.

Mr. WARREN. Pending that, I ask the Senator from California to yield to me for two or three minutes to finish the consideration of a bill which has been under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

CORCORAN ART GALLERY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2610, which was read on a former day, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] had moved an amendment, which is acceptable.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the bill is not yet before the Senate. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the title of the bill be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2610) to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery, in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that bill will not lead to debate, I have no objection to its consideration; otherwise I shall object.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend the amendment of the committee, in section 1, page 2, line 6, by adding, after the word "determined," the words "provided the same can be secured for a sum not exceeding $332,500."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an amendment to the amendment of the committee. Now let the amendment of the committee as amended be agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the first page, section 1, line 5, I move to strike out the words "and in the manner."

That refers to the condemnation.

Mr. WARREN. That makes it conform to the other amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I propose to strike out the whole of section 2 about condemnation, so that there shall be no misunderstanding about it, and the property will only be taken in the event that it can be secured for $332,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, section 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "and in the manner;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed to acquire for and in the name of the United States, for the purpose hereinafter provided, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are other amendments of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. There is an amendment to section 3.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will be section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in section 3, page 2, line 16, after the word "and," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-two;" and in line 17, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $332,500 is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a building for the Department of Justice," approved March 3, 1899, as provides "that said building shall be constructed so as to provide a court room and necessary accommodations for the Court of Claims" be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I move, in view of the amendments heretofore adopted, to strike out the whole of section 2 and to renumber sections 3 and 4, making them Nos. 2 and 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will renumber the sections. Section 2 has already been stricken out.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the resolution with reference to the Pennsylvania case be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from California, which will be read.

The Secretary having read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania—

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, during the seven years that I have had the honor to occupy a seat as members of this honorable body, I have invariably voted to seat those who have come here with proper credentials of their election or appointment by governors of their respective States, believing that if I erred I should do so on the side of the people and vote to give each State the representation it is entitled to under the Constitution. My views, therefore, being well known, I should content myself by remaining silent and casting my vote in favor of adopting the minority report of the committee, were it not for the fact that a part of the public press in the State I have the honor in part to represent, has seen proper to criticise me for having stated that I should be consistent and vote to seat the appointees of the governors in the States where the legislatures had failed to elect.

The States where the legislatures adjourned last year without electing Senators were Pennsylvania, California, Delaware, and Utah. Happily the governor of California, in his wisdom, convened the legislature in special session, and a wise and judicious selection was made by the legislature, and that State now has her full representation on this floor. I value too highly the good opinion of the people of California who have so often honored me, and to whom I owe so much for their kindness and forbearance, not to give an explanation of my action and the reasons for the faith in my convictions.

LAW THE ONLY GUIDE.

It has been stated that I was influenced, in a measure, by personal and political friendship. I trust that I have a proper appreciation of my duty when sitting as a judge or juror to be guided only by the law and evidence as I understand them. I have not seen Mr. Quay for a year, and neither he nor his friends have asked me how I should vote, and I am sure I am not bound to him by any ties of political, social, or other obligations. But in no sense is the seating of a Senator a personal matter. I would vote to seat any reputable gentleman as readily as I will to seat Mr. Quay if the governor of a State should appoint him under the same conditions that now exist in Pennsylvania. It may not, however, be improper for me to say that I know nothing whatever detrimental to the character and reputation of Mr. Quay.

I do know, however, that he was a brave soldier and that his neighbors all speak well of him as being a loyal friend, and the great State of Pennsylvania has honored him again and again.

Surely one who has such a reputation among his neighbors and his friends must have some good traits of character. But, as I said before, it is not a question of personal friendship. It is a judicial question. It is one upon which we should act under the solemnity of the oath we have taken here to perform our duty as we understand it as representatives of the people.

Article I, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. * * * And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

There is certainly nothing ambiguous, equivocal, or clouded in the first paragraph of this section of the Constitution, which I have read. Every State is entitled to two Senators, whether it is the State of Rhode Island, with an area of only 1,250 square miles, or Texas, containing 265,000 square miles; whether it is New York, with 7,000,000 population, or Nevada, with only 45,000 population. It also seems to me clear that they shall be elected by the legislature, or if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, then the governor may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

SOVEREIGNTY OF THE STATE.

No one can read that interesting and instructive book, With the Fathers Framing the Constitution, by McMasters, without being deeply impressed with the fact that the great men composing the Convention that drafted the Constitution had constantly in mind the sovereignty of the State as represented by the Senate, and that the latter should always be kept full—each State having two Senators. The distinguished Senators from Tennessee and Michigan admitted this, and then proceeded, in a very able argument, to show how vacancies might always occur and a State, for a time at least, be only partly represented.

I would call attention, Mr. President, to the wording of the constitutional provision as reported by the committee on detail of the Constitutional Convention. That portion relating to the filling of vacancies reads as follows:

Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.

Here, it seems to me, the design of the Convention is clearly manifest: An existing vacancy may be filled by the governor until such time as the legislature may meet. If it acts, well and good; it will have performed its duty. If it should fail to agree upon a candidate, a vacancy would exist, and, according to the draft of the provision as set forth, it could undoubtedly be again filled temporarily by the governor.

The right to equal representation in the Senate, which was so strongly contended for in the Convention, would exist in spite of the inability of the legislature to elect after striving to do so, and the means of securing this equality would exist in the power of the governor to appoint as provided. The State, by endeavoring to elect a Senator, would manifest its desire to be represented fully in the Senate, and the governor would have the power to appoint, in order to fulfill that desire. His power could not, I take it, be properly construed as failing in the event simply of a lack of agreement on the part of the legislature.

DESIRE FOR REPRESENTATION.

The desire of the people to be fully represented would be manifested by the effort of their representatives, futile though it might be, to elect a Senator. Only in the event that these representatives of the people should by vote declare that they would not elect could their action be made the ground for sound argument that the governor could not temporarily appoint. Under such circumstances there would be good reason for the claim that the people did not desire full representation. But without such a declaration on the part of the legislature it seems to me there is no question but that it is the duty of the governor to act when a vacancy exists.

Except during the period of the civil war, no States, I believe, have refused to elect a Senator. At all times, as the framers of the Constitution foresaw, there has been a keen desire for full representation in Congress. It is shown by the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention there was a contest of the most earnest kind by the smaller States for representation in the Senate equal to that of the larger, and this right was conceded. The questions arising in Congress affecting the interests of individual States are too numerous and important to permit unequal representation to be tolerated, if avoidable. And so provision was made for temporarily filling vacancies which exist during recess of a legislature. When a legislature is in session, it having the sole power to elect for the full term, the governor's power lapses. During recess, when the legislature can not act, the power to make a temporary appointment vests in him.

There is, it seems to me, no good ground to question the continual existence of a power to fill such vacancy as may happen—or, in other words, may exist—at any time. Such vacancies, then, as happen to exist during a session of the legislature can be filled during its session only by that body. Such as happen to exist during a recess of the legislature can be filled only by the governor. In this manner only can the right to equal representation be assured to the States and the great contention in the Constitutional Convention be established.

A STATE'S REPRESENTATION TO BE ALWAYS FULL.

While the right of equal representation was thus secured to the States by constitutional provision, the design of the framers of that instrument that the representation should be constantly kept full is made evident by the command that when vacancies occur in either House they shall be filled. The manner in which this command shall be obeyed differs in the cases of the Senate and House because of the difference in the manner of electing Senators and Representatives. The former are elected by legislatures, and the latter by the people by ballot. At the time when the Constitution was framed legislatures held yearly sessions, so that a vacancy in the Senate could be filled within a year and no Congress need be without a full Senate in case the legislature was willing to elect. Thus there was no need of other command than that the legislature "shall" elect. By obeying it full representation would be secured.

As legislative sessions were usually synchronous with those of Congress, if elections were not held by them there would be no danger in placing power to make temporary appointment in the hands of the governor, for his appointee would be likely to serve during only a part of a Congressional session, the greater part of his term being during the recess of Congress. As his term of service might fall wholly during such recess, or at any rate during only a part of the session, the governor was given discretion in the matter, and the words "may make temporary appointments" were used, for an appointment that would hold good only during a recess of Congress would be of no practical benefit to the State as far as representation is concerned. Neither would an appointment be of much value if the term of the appointee were for a few weeks before a legislature could act. Hence there was good ground for giving discretion in this case.

CASE OF A REPRESENTATIVE.

But in the matter of a Representative a wholly different state of affairs exists. A Representative holds for two years and his successor is elected by the people. Such elections come regularly, therefore, every two years; and unless otherwise provided for, a vacancy occurring at the beginning of a term would go unfilled for that Congress and the next; so that for two years the State would be without its proportionate representation in the lower House. This of course could not be permitted, and as the only way to fill the vacancy would be by popular election, the executive was commanded to call a special election for that purpose. There was no chance here for allowing the governor discretion. The House must be kept full, if possible, and no single session must be permitted to be held without full representation. Thus the command was laid upon the governor, and thus the States do not go an entire session without full representation in the House.

The member elected to Congress from Utah was, a few weeks since, denied a seat, for cause, in the House of Representatives, and the governor immediately called an election to fill the vacancy, and that State now has its full representation in that branch of Congress. A vacancy, however, exists in its representation in the Senate, and the people of Utah are patiently awaiting the result of our action, to know if they can have the full representation on this floor that is allotted to them under the Constitution.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there can be no doubt as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution to provide that the States should always have their full representation in both Houses of Congress; and if such be the fact, there can be no doubt that the provision of the Constitution relative to vacancies in the Senate covers every contingency. There can be no doubt that it provides for the temporary appointment to a vacancy whenever it exists during a recess of the legislature, whether that body has tried to fill it or not. The vacancy is to be filled; and if it had occurred to the framers that a condition could exist in which the governor could not act if he so desired, I am sure there would have been a further provision commanding him in such case to call an extra session of the legislature to fill the vacancy. That such command is not found is to me proof that, in the opinion of the framers, there was no chance that a vacancy could remain unfilled.

POWER OF A GOVERNOR.

Nowhere is there a prohibition of the exercise of the appointing power of the governor as there would have been had it been imagined that any circumstances could arise which would make the exercise of that power inadvisable. The power was given to the legislature when it could act, and to the governor when it could not do so.

If the appointees of governors are seated, no harm is done, as it will only be a few months before the legislature will meet and the action of the governor be approved or rebuked.

I think Nebraska, and possibly other States, is to elect two Senators at the next session of their legislature. Suppose that the contest between the three parties is so evenly balanced that they are unable to agree, and it results in no choice of Senators. Shall that great State, with her varied and diversified interests, go unrepresented?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. I have been very greatly impressed by the forceful way in which he has brought out the distinction between the temporary character of the gubernatorial appointment and the election by the legislature for a full term or the balance of a term, showing that they are both absolutely distinct in their spheres, independent in their action, and conflict in no wise with each other. It has been asserted by the Senator from Maryland, and, I believe, by other Senators, that the legislature of the great State which he represents in this body in part was called together by the governor, and that the legislature of Pennsylvania should have been likewise called together by the governor of that State.

I have made the statement here that the legislature of Pennsylvania, if convened in special session, would impose an expense upon the taxpayers of that State amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, and that it was generally recognized and is recognized in Pennsylvania that such a special session convened by the governor would be absolutely futile and useless in its results.

I have since that debate arose been informed that in the California case there was a distinct understanding, in fact I have been informed, although I do not know how correctly, that a paper was actually signed by a majority of the members of the California legislature agreeing to come to some agreement upon the United States Senatorship. I should like to ask the Senator from California, if it be not interrupting the continuity of his argument, whether I am correct in that statement, and whether it does not place the California situation upon an entirely different basis from that of Pennsylvania.

THE SENATORIAL ELECTION IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, before answering the question directly, perhaps I should explain the system which prevails in California as to the meeting of our legislature and the number composing the membership of that legislature.

California has biennial sessions of her legislature. The legislature is composed of 80 assemblymen and 40 senators, elected respectively from the different assembly and senatorial districts. Therefore, our legislature is composed of a hundred and twenty members. It met, as required by our State constitution, on the first Monday in January, 1899. It organized, I think, on the first Tuesday. On the second Wednesday it convened in joint session and continued to ballot daily and sometimes several times a day during the session, which lasted, I think, seventy-two days, and during that session there were cast in joint convention 120 separate ballots. No choice, however, was made, none of the different candidates for Senator receiving a majority of the votes in the two houses.

The legislature in due time adjourned sine die, after having been in session seventy-two days, I think. The press of our State and public organizations immediately commenced to importune the governor of the State to convene an extra session of the legislature for the purpose of electing a Senator to succeed Senator White, who was my colleague for six years upon this floor, but he resisted their appeals, and it was stated through the public press and generally believed that he would not convene it unless a majority of the members of the two houses would give him some assurance that they would meet together and in the quickest possible time agree upon a choice for Senator.

One of the members, aye two different members of the legislature, informed me that they had seen the paper. I did not myself. But it provided that they should meet and agree upon a candidate. Some 66 names, I think it was reported to me, had been signed to that paper. Be that as it may, subsequent events would seem to give some color of truth to that rumor, which was an open secret, that such a document had been circulated.

On the 29th of January, 1900, which was the fifth Monday, I think, of this year, the legislature convened at our capitol in Sacramento, and on the first day it organized. On the second Tuesday, nine days from the day on which it organized, they voted in the separate houses, and my distinguished colleague received a majority of the votes of the two houses of our legislature. On the following day, Wednesday, which was the tenth day after the legislature had convened, they met in joint convention, and the choice fell very wisely, I think—it certainly gave universal satisfaction to the people of our State and to the country generally—upon one who has been identified with the history and prosperity and advancement of the golden State, and whose life is a part of the history of that State. I refer to my distinguished colleague, Hon. THOMAS R. BARD. He was elected on the first ballot, receiving 85 votes out of the 120 votes cast in joint convention.

THE CAUCUS AGREEMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to get a word of explanation from him, when he says the members of the legislature, as he understands, signed a paper making an agreement which led the governor to call the legislature, he does not mean that they signed a paper agreeing to vote for any particular man?

Mr. PERKINS. Not for a particular person.

Mr. CHANDLER. But only that they signed a paper agreeing that they would agree?

Mr. PERKINS. That they would agree upon a candidate, and that he should be elected.

Mr. CHANDLER. How was the language of the agreement expressed, if the Senator can tell us?

Mr. PERKINS. It was only as I have stated. It was a rumor that came to me, and therefore I am not competent to give testimony bearing upon the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. PERKINS. But subsequent events would warrant me in believing that such an agreement did exist, for our legislature was in session only thirteen days, when it adjourned and received the plaudits of all the good citizens of our State. Does the Senator from South Carolina desire to interrupt me?

Mr. TILLMAN. Is not every member of the legislature charged with the duty of electing a Senator under a higher form of obligation than a mere written agreement? Did not he take an oath to support that Constitution, and is it not one of his functions and his duties to vote for a Senator and elect him when there is a vacancy?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, is it not belittling the question to put this on the ground of an agreement, after the legislature had been deadlocked, so to speak, for a good while and had failed to carry out its function in an election, that then as a sort of personal arrangement they signed a written agreement that they would do a certain thing at a certain time; in other words, that they would go home and soak themselves and get a little softer, so that they would be more malleable and more obedient to the will of their constituents? Is not that rather a belittling and a contemptible way of putting it?

Mr. PERKINS. I think my friend from South Carolina, perhaps, would have illustrated the case better by stating the case of a member of a jury, that there were 11 obstinate ones on that jury who knew nothing, but the twelfth juryman was like the old lady in her church who said she did not know how it was that all other denominations were in error except her own. Therefore, the only excuse I can make is that they met together and mutually agreed that while each one had the best man in view for the position, yet he would defer his judgment, and the twelfth juryman yielded to the other 11 jurors.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does not the Senator see that if by reason of this obstinacy on the part of public servants as members of the legislature, who have a duty to perform, they fail to have the State represented we will perpetuate that system? If we allow a man appointed by the governor to come here and occupy the seat; or, in other words, if we make a bridge over which these people can cross and not be subject to the condemnation of their constituents, will not we ourselves perpetuate the deadlock? Can not the Senator see that the Senate can correct this evil by leaving any State without representation in the Senate whose legislature refuses to elect a Senator?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I have lived long enough to realize the fact that one should not set himself up as the moral censor of others. There is an old tradition that in the city of Jerusalem it was obligatory upon everyone to keep his own doorsteps clean and to look after his own home, and that command has been religiously observed, I understand, for many years, and since then the streets of Jerusalem have been kept clean.

So it is with us as individuals. It is better that each one should say, "I am the custodian of my own conscience; I will act in accordance with the light that is given me, in accordance with my own convictions, in accordance with my own faith, but I will not be dogmatic." Indeed, there is not a law upon our statute books that is not a measure of compromise. My friend from South Carolina introduces a bill; my friend from South Dakota proposes an amendment, and another Senator proposes an amendment, and so we discuss the amendments and out of them finally we perfect a bill that is intended to carry out the object which the bill has in view. So it is with us in the discharge of our duties as citizens of the great Republic. Each one of us has a duty to perform; and if he acts conscientiously and does it according to the lights before him, no one will censure him for it, and he will have the approval of his own conscience.

PRESS CRITICISMS.

The public press of my State, as I stated in the commencement of my remarks, censured me, and I do not complain of criticism. I rather like it. I think that it keeps us all on our good behavior when the public press takes us to task for some of our shortcomings. The only thing that I do blame them for is when they state a false proposition and then commence to reason from it. They could condemn even as virtuous and as good a man on that kind of a basis as my friend from South Carolina. It is in such a case that I blame the public press, but no one is worthy of any public position who is not willing to let his public acts be investigated and subjected to honest and fair criticism; and if he will not stand criticism, let him go down, as he ought to do.

Now, I am going to take the liberty of reading a little excerpt from one of the papers. It is a leading paper, and it is a good paper, too. All papers are good, but, like beverages, some are better than others, and so this is one of the very best. It says:

The news that Senator PERKINS has decided to vote for the seating of Senator Quay, and almost necessarily will follow this by voting for all the other appointed Senators, including one from California (if Governor Gage should decide to appoint)— took most of the Senator's constituents by surprise, and we believe that a vast majority of them were greatly disappointed. They will regret Senator PERKINS's decision for a number of reasons. In the first place, they will regret it because they dislike to see any action which favors so objectionable a political boss as Quay, of Pennsylvania. In the second place, they will regret it because it is likely to result in the seating of a Senator from California who will be objectionable to all of the better elements of the party.

At that time it was supposed the governor would appoint—

Mr. President, the writer of that article is personally known to me as a gentleman of high character and standing, and he has the respect of all who know him. Yet what argument is there in that article? You might as well say, after being sworn in on a jury upon a criminal trial, "I do not like the looks of that man, and I think I will convict him. It matters not what the testimony may be; it matters not what offense he may be charged with; I am against him on general principles." That is the spirit of that editorial. I think I have manhood enough to do justice, if I were on a jury, to the bitterest enemy I have in the world. I think in casting my vote here I can be uninfluenced by aught save what my conscience tells me it is right and just for me to do.

WHAT A CALIFORNIA TEXT-BOOK SAYS.

I say such editorials tend to mislead the people. But it is gratifying to me that I am given an opportunity to propose a change in some of our text-books if that editor's position is correct and if I am wrong in my interpretation of the Constitution. I want to say to my friend the editor of that paper that California has a text-book known as Elements of Civil Government.

It is compiled by the State board of education, composed of the governor, the superintendent of public instruction, and the principals of the five State normal schools in our State, where they educate young men and women for our colleges and universities. That text-book is an authority, and many of those who compiled it are lawyers. All of them are college graduates, men of scholarly attainments, men of great learning. It is a very able work, and it has never been questioned. Therefore I want to read what it says in relation to the Federal Government as it applies to the Senate:

The Senate consists of two members from each of the States of the Union. Senators are chosen by the legislature of the State they represent, and they hold office for six years. They must be not less than 30 years of age, citizens of the United States for nine years, and inhabitants of the State which they are chosen to represent.

That, of course, is nearly the exact language of the Constitution. Then on the next page, after giving the standing committees of the Senate, they come down to vacancies:

Vacancies.—Vacancies from any State are filled by the legislature of that State, if the legislature is in session; if not, then by the governor of the State until the next meeting of the legislature.

SHOULD THIS TEXT-BOOK BE REVISED.

If this text-book is wrong and vacancies do not exist unless the incumbent dies, or resigns, or is impeached, we ought to change our text-book which is used to teach young men and young women in California the elementary principles of civil government. We have, Mr. President, the best system of public schools in California that exists in any State in the Union, and we have in our State two of the grandest universities. One was magnificently endowed by my predecessor, Senator Stanford. He and his good wife gave to that institution more than $40,000,000 to perpetually endow it. There are to-day 2,000 students in that university. At the head stands a man eminent in science and literature, President David Starr Jordan, who has made this seat of learning second to none in the United States.

The University of California is, in the organic law of the State, provided for by a constitutional provision. There are to-day 2,600 students in that university. It has a president who has an international reputation as a historian, classical scholar, and as a man of wide learning—President Benjamin Ide Wheelerof, whom Cornell University was so justly proud. It has at the head of its geological department Professor Le Conte, one of the most eminent scientists in this or any other country.

The President of the United States has recently selected as one of the Philippine commissioners Prof. Bernard Moses, who for twenty-odd years has held the chair of history and political economy in that institution. We have a corps of professors there equal to that in any other State, not excepting Harvard, Princeton, or Yale. I think it is their duty to assist us in revising the elementary book upon civil government which is used in our schools and universities, if it is incorrect and is so decided by the Senate.

Another authority——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator read again what that schoolbook says in regard to the election of Senators?

Mr. PERKINS. It says:

Vacancies from any State are filled by the legislature of that State, if the legislature is in session.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is right.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; that is right.

If not, then by the governor of the State until the next meeting of the legislature.

VACANCIES AFTER ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But the legislature was in session when the vacancy occurred; therefore——

Mr. PERKINS. Therefore, it did not exist after the legislature adjourned.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It did not happen——
Mr. PERKINS. It did not happen to exist.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is not what the Constitution says. The Constitution does not say "happen to exist."
Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUARLES in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?
Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.
Mr. LINDSAY. Who is the author of that text-book?
Mr. PERKINS. I stated that it refers to the Constitution. That is pretty good authority. It is their interpretation of the Constitution.
Mr. LINDSAY. I understand; but who construed the Constitution in the preparation of the book?
Mr. PERKINS. The State Board of Education, of which one member is the governor, who is an eminent lawyer. He is ex officio chairman of the board. The superintendent of public instruction is a lawyer by profession and has taken the degree of bachelor of arts. The principals of the five State normal schools assisted in compiling it.

The point I wish to make is that there could not have been any doubt in the minds of these gentlemen, and I refer to California text-books, because I am speaking now more particularly upon this question to put myself right with my own constituents, to whom I owe so much, and whose good opinion I desire to have. We all like to have the good opinion of our friends and neighbors. Some of us perhaps strive for it. We ought to do it. It is a commendable ambition. Some people have a better reputation than they deserve, and some people have not as good a reputation as they deserve. Character is what we are; reputation is what people say about us. Some people do not say as many nice things of us as they ought to say, as our character would justify them in saying. Therefore it is sometimes necessary that we should put ourselves right upon those questions as we understand them.

SOME MORE AUTHORITIES.

But I am going to give my friend from Kentucky two more authorities—and the library is full of those authorities. I am a layman, which is self-evident, and not a student of the law. Yet I like to read the works of Story and Cooley and other eminent law writers. Even Greenleaf on Evidence sometimes is interesting to me.
Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?
Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.
Mr. CHANDLER. Inasmuch as the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Kentucky seem to think the Senator from California ought not to have cited eminent authority in his own State sustaining the Senator's contention and my contention as to the meaning of the clause in the Constitution as to vacancies, I think it ought to be stated that this book was compiled under the direction of the State board of education. I find the names of the board given on the second page: Henry H. Markham, James W. Anderson, Ira Moore, Charles W. Childs, and Edward T. Pierce.

I know nothing about them; but I think that while the argument may not be of more value, this authority sustaining our contention is just as valuable and the Senator is just as much entitled to cite it as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has to cite, as he did the other day, the work of J. Randolph Tucker on the Constitution.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, the Senator——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?
Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

DIFFERENT READINGS OF THE CLAUSE.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from New Hampshire entirely misunderstands the point of my remark or inquiry. As the book was read it seemed to me that it failed absolutely to sustain the contention of the Senator from California and the Senator from New Hampshire.
Mr. CHANDLER. That shows that the Senator does not read the clause in that book right, just as he does not read the clause in the Constitution right.
Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I wish to give another——
Mr. LINDSAY. I wish to say——
Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire is the only infallible interpreter.
Mr. CHANDLER. Sensible men reading both clauses can put but one meaning upon them. The meaning that has been attached some times hitherto is a mistaken and erroneous one. This authority is not conclusive by any means. The Senator from California does not cite it as conclusive; but it is very respectable authority nevertheless.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Indeed, it is.
Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?
Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. I want light, Mr. President.
Mr. LINDSAY. I had no idea of questioning the propriety of the authority, but I did think it was proper to ask the Senator from California who had compiled the book which gave that interpretation to the Constitution, in order that I might ascertain of how much value the authority might be in determining this question.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now, this book says:

Vacancies from any State are filled by the legislature of that State, if the legislature is in session.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that language was in the Constitution, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] concedes that the governor might make an appointment under the present circumstances.

NOT A CASE FOR DOUBT.

Mr. PERKINS. The point I wish to make in this connection is that if there had been any doubt in the mind of this State board of education, composed, as I said, of able lawyers, scholars, and students of political economy, they would have given the interpretation which my friend from Connecticut desires to give it.
Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me one word, they would have written at the close of that statement, "It must, however, be understood that if a legislature has a chance to elect a Senator, tries to do it and does not do it, then the governor can not make the appointment."

Now, they did not write that into their account of the meaning of the Constitution, because it is not in the original Constitution, and never has been anywhere except in the vivid imagination of distinguished constitutional lawyers.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And in the decisions of the Senate.
Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?
Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.
Mr. LINDSAY. As the Senator from California says that the eminent gentlemen who prepared that book did not have the slightest doubt about the propriety of their interpretation, I will ask him when that book was prepared, whether before or since the Lee Mantle and the Corbett cases? I want to get at whether the opinion of a majority of the United States Senate did not even raise a question of doubt with them.

ANOTHER OPINION IN POINT.

Mr. PERKINS. Eighteen hundred and ninety-two is the date. But I want to give one other authority. My friend from Michigan cited innumerable authorities. I will now quote from one who was a Senator of the United States, George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts. He is also an eminent writer. This book is entitled The Constitution of the United States at the End of the First Century, by George S. Boutwell. Under the chapter "Rights and privileges of members of Congress," he states as follows:

The gravest exercise of power over State authorities is to be found in the statute of 1866 (Stat. 14, 243), which reappears in the Revised Statutes, sections 14-17, inclusive. By that statute the legislatures of the respective States are required, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to proceed to the election of a Senator whenever a vacancy exists or whenever a vacancy will occur previous to the next meeting of the legislature.

Each house is required openly and by a viva voce vote of each member present to name one person for Senator in Congress. On the next day the houses are required to meet in convention, the respective journals are to be read, and if each house has given a majority of votes for the same person his election is to be declared; but if no such majority appears, then the two houses are required to take at least one vote, and in case of a failure to elect, the houses are required to meet each succeeding day at 12 o'clock, meridian, and take at least one vote until an election shall have been made, or the session shall have come to an end.

I repeat the closing part of the last sentence:

Until an election shall have been made or the session shall have come to an end.

Senator Boutwell understood well that the governor had the power to fill vacancies when one happened to exist because of the legislature failing to elect. I say he understood it undoubtedly, or in this able work, from which he has achieved a national reputation as a writer, he would have qualified it and said a State shall have no more representation on this floor until the legislature meets again, because the legislature failed to perform its duty.

Another authority—and the Library, as I said, is full of them, although I selected only these three, with which I am familiar——

MR. TILLMAN AGAIN.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from California allow me right there?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Carolina?
Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.
Mr. TILLMAN. Is not ex-Governor Boutwell's book merely a reproduction of the statutes of the United States on that subject?
Mr. PERKINS. There is no quotation from them.
Mr. TILLMAN. I am somewhat familiar with the statute, and I know that it is practically that word for word, and that that requirement to meet day by day and take one ballot and all that are from the statute. There is nothing in the Constitution about that.

Mr. PERKINS. He says until "the session shall have come to an end."

Mr. TILLMAN. I say that is the statute of the United States; and Congress could provide by statute, if it saw fit, that such vacancy should not be filled by executive action in such a contingency.

Mr. PERKINS. I will give you later on what PERKINS says.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. PERKINS from California?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; from California. [Laughter.]

I have here a quotation from one whom I know my friend the Senator from Kentucky reveres. He is a great writer and one of the ablest jurists this country has ever known. I refer to Judge Thomas M. Cooley, doctor of laws, and in this book on the general principles of constitutional law he makes a statement similar to that which I have read from Governor Boutwell's treatise on the Constitution.

STRIVING AFTER A TECHNICALITY.

But I will not weary you by reading it, because, as I have stated, I want to give you my interpretation for what it is worth and to speak for California more particularly. I desire to show that my action is based upon the text-books from which we are teaching our students and young men in California who are to succeed us here, and if they are wrong, we want to correct them.

Mr. President, it seems to me from a layman's standpoint that it is straining hard after a technicality to construe the words in the Constitution to mean that a vacancy can only happen by death or resignation, and pay no heed to the word "otherwise." As well ask what was the original color of ink or the color of the goose from which the quill was plucked that wrote this particular section of the Constitution. It seems so to me from a layman's standpoint. Why should we strain after these technicalities?

The Constitution gives the President the power to appoint ambassadors, consuls, judges, and other Federal officers, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This implies that the Senate has equal power with the President in making these appointments. It frequently happens, however, that the Senate does not consent to some of these appointments, and in many instances the President again reappoints the same person. During the recess of Congress I think one of the nominations now pending before the Senate—a United States district judge for North Carolina—has been made three different times, and the nomination has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

Many similar instances occurred during the previous Administration, and no one has questioned the action or right of our Presidents. Why, then, should we be so technical in relation to the section of the Constitution which gives the governor the right to fill temporarily an existing vacancy in the Senate. Article II, section 2, Constitution, giving this authority, reads as follows:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

INTERPRETATION OF THE WORD "HAPPENS."

It seems to me that the wise men and statesmen who framed the Constitution would have made no reference to the executive, giving him the power to appoint until the next meeting of the legislature, were it not that they realized the importance of having two Senators always from each State. I think the difference of opinion, in a great measure, grows out of the difference in the interpretation of the meaning of the word "happens." Underlying all the shades of meaning of the verb "to happen" is the idea of existence. It is not the idea of beginning. A condition may happen to begin—may happen to come into existence—or it may simply happen to exist some time after it has happened to begin. It seems to me there can be no other logical interpretation placed upon this sentence. A vacancy may simply happen to exist, which it does in the case where the legislature has failed to elect. It happens to exist. Why? Because the legislature failed to elect.

It is in this latter sense that, when we take into consideration the intent of the founders of the Constitution, we are compelled to take the word "happens" as it occurs in the clause just given. If it was designed that the clause should mean "if vacancies happen to begin," etc., there would plainly be a limitation upon the power of the governor to appoint, and therefore there would be left a chance that at some time a State might be deprived of its full representation in the Senate.

But clearly it was not the intention of the convention that there should be any chance for such inequality to exist, and we must take the word "happens" in the other sense, which will make the clause mean "if vacancies happen to exist," etc. With this interpretation there can be no doubt as to the power of a governor to appoint after a legislature has failed to elect, and this is according to the spirit of the Constitution and according to the spirit of its framers. It seems to me, therefore, that the denial of the power of a governor to appoint when a vacancy has begun during the session of a legislature which has failed to elect is repudiation of that great fundamental idea of equality on which our institutions are based.

THE STATES SHOULD BE ASSURED FULL REPRESENTATION.

But, Mr. President, is it not wise for Congress to say, by its action, to the legislature of the different States, "The people shall not be deprived of their representation on the floor of this Senate by your neglect; if you fail to elect, then the governor's appointee shall be seated?" It may frequently happen that the governor would not select the same gentleman that the legislature would have done. It is possible, had the governor of Nebraska convened the legislature, which he had the right to do, that we would have been deprived of the counsel and experience of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who, I regret to see, is temporarily absent. That the governor acted wisely no one for a moment questions. I believe that our country has less to fear in placing individual responsibility than in distributing it among a a great many.

No one who, as judge, has the final decision of a law case, or, as chief executive of the nation or of a State, the appointments to office, the power to pardon, grant reprieves, or commute the sentence of one who has violated the law, but is deeply impressed with the great individual responsibility resting upon him. He alone must take the responsibility; he can not share it with another.

I venture the assertion that there is not a Senator on this floor who, as governor of his State, has had sent to him petitions for executive clemency, where the penalty was death, who has not spent days and nights considering the transcript on appeal and praying for light to aid him in the performance of a most responsible and solemn duty. I know this has been my experience. I have passed through this great, trying ordeal. I have experienced as the executive of my own State a greater responsibility than I have ever felt in any other place, when I realized the fact that the life and liberty of an individual could be decided by only one—myself—who had been temporarily given the power.

RESPONSIBILITY OF A GOVERNOR.

No one can feel this responsibility without acting conscientiously and finding the approval of his own conscience, praying for light from Heaven to guide him in the performance of his duty, that he may do justice to the people, justice to the accused, justice in accordance with the obligations of the oath he has taken as the executive of a great State. No one, as I have stated, can have been placed in this trying and responsible place without feeling that it was a very great ordeal. The governor of a State is not a hereditary ruler, responsible, under the decayed doctrine of divine right, only to God. He is in the most emphatic degree the mere servant of the people and responsible to them for his public acts. In his high office he can not do as he pleases; he must do as the people please, or suffer the weight of that punishment which they have the power to inflict and which few men will willingly incur.

Yet the argument of many in this contest implies that the governor of a great State will in making an appointment to the highest legislative body in the world do so without giving due thought and consideration to the wishes of the people. Do we forget that the governor is elected by the whole people of the State; that his election is the result of the popular vote of the Commonwealth, while the members of the legislature are elected by circumscribed districts? We should remember that the governor is as near and in as close touch with the people as are the members of the legislature, and he must realize that if he acts contrary to their wishes, to public sentiment, the people will surely rebuke and censure him at the polls.

Great wrong and injustice may be done a Commonwealth when deprived of its full representation in the Senate. At the last session of Congress one vote decided the ratification of the Paris treaty of peace and ended the war with Spain. In the present Congress many treaties with other countries have been considered, while legislation of the greatest importance has been pending. The civil government of Hawaii, Porto Rico, Alaska, the financial bill, the shipping bill, Nicaragua Canal bill, and many other measures affecting the welfare of our country are or have been before us for consideration, and no State is more deeply interested in a satisfactory solution of these difficult and perplexing problems than the great State of Pennsylvania.

No possible wrong or harm can be done by seating the appointee of the governor of any State, as in but very few instances can the appointment hold for more than one year, and in this appointment it can only continue a few months, when the legislature of Pennsylvania will again convene in session and either indorse or repudiate the action of the governor.

A CHANGE IN METHODS OF ELECTION NECESSARY.

That there can arise from a provision of our Constitution a question of such vital importance to us as a nation is self-evident proof of the necessity for a constitutional amendment. This case before the Senate is only one of the many which, to my mind, show the need of a change in the method of electing United States Senators. The present method places the choice too far from the people, and in consequence the rights of the people are in danger of being disregarded.

It is year by year becoming more obvious that the election of Senators must be placed in the hands of the people themselves instead of in the legislatures. We must get back to the fundamental idea of equality; we must remove all chances for scandals; we must come nearer the people; we must be in touch and in sympathy with their aspirations and wishes; we must by constitutional amendment give the voters of the United States the power to elect by their own votes the men who are to represent them in this Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, on two previous occasions I have spoken at length upon this constitutional question, and I have very little to say except in repetition of what I then said. I have some desire to make allusion to the eloquent and lengthy discourse a few days ago of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. Few as my words shall be, I am aware that it is getting late in the afternoon. Saturday afternoon is one of the times when Senators are unwilling to stay, and I think perhaps I had better refrain from speaking now and proceed on Monday forenoon. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] intends to speak, and at least for this afternoon I yield to him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know, Mr. President. I think, after the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that he preferred not to speak in a thin Senate on Saturday afternoon, when Senators make a sort of half holiday of the occasion, I would scarcely be expected to go on at present.

There is another suggestion which I should like to make. That other observation is this: I had desired to hear what the Senator from New Hampshire, who is chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and heads the minority report in this case, would say upon it; not that I felt that I should be able to answer him, but I should like to know from his own lips before I speak what his position is or is to be. I think a better arrangement is that the Senator, immediately after the routine business on Monday morning, shall go forward with his speech, and I will endeavor to follow him with some short remarks.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was in hopes that I would entice the Senator from Connecticut to go on and speak before I did. Under the circumstances I will not speak this afternoon, but will move an executive session.

Mr. PETTUS and Mr. DANIEL addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. I was not desiring to avail myself of the floor, except merely to move an adjournment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask leave of the Senate to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2572) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.," approved February 21, 1899.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved February 21, 1899, entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.," be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, in acquiring the site and in erecting said building, in addition to the uses therein provided for, to provide suitable court rooms, clerks' offices, marshals' offices, and all other necessary and convenient quarters for the Federal courts and officers in all courts authorized now or hereafter to be held at said point; and an additional sum of $120,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for such additions and changes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PENROSE. I wish to ask the Senator to yield to me for one moment to make a statement in reference to the Pennsylvania case.

Mr. PETTUS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think it should be understood by every member of the Senate that the Quay resolution shall be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of routine morning business upon Monday next. I understand from the information I can receive that there are at most two or three speeches to be made in favor of the minority report of the committee. How many are to be made on the other side I do not know; but there can be little doubt that if Monday and Tuesday are devoted to the consideration of this question all the debate can be indulged in that is required by the nature of the case or by the wishes of any Senator. I hope that will be the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 23, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 21, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order, which is for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 1, of the bill, after the word "pay," insert "and allowances prescribed by law."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise for the purpose of withdrawing my demand for a separate vote on each amendment; and in making that request, I wish to say a few words to define my position. I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his demand for a separate vote on each of the amendments, and asks unanimous consent of the House to be heard for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say that in demanding a separate vote on each amendment last night, I did so because I felt that on this side of the House we had not had an opportunity for a fair and reasonable discussion of the proposition before the House. It was intimated when the question came up that we were to have two hours' debate on the armor-plate question. When the point was reached we were denied that privilege. In discussing the point of order, when I was strictly in order—and any gentleman who examines the RECORD will see that every word I stated was directly on the point of order and not outside of it—the House refused to allow me to proceed.

Under such circumstances there is but one remedy that the minority can resort to, and that is to let the majority know that it will not expedite the bill or make time if it undertakes to throttle a fair and reasonable hearing on the part of the minority. For that reason I demanded a separate vote on each amendment. Having demonstrated, I think, to the satisfaction of the gentlemen on that side that they have not by their course expedited their bill, there is no reason for us to continue these tactics, and I therefore withdraw the demand for a separate vote.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. In reply only to what the gentleman from Alabama has said?

Mr. FOSS. In reply to what he has said.

Mr. RIDGELY. I would like unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to make a request.

Mr. FOSS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Does any other gentleman desire a separate vote on the amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have the three minutes he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] may have three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I want to state, in reply to what the gentleman from Alabama has said, that I was perfectly willing there should be general debate on some of the provisions of this bill, and I so stated. But when the time came to arrange for general debate, I was unable to get an agreement. Gentlemen upon the other side had repeatedly attempted to delay this measure and had insisted upon attempting to overrule the decisions of the Chair, so that I was placed beyond the pale of making an agreement with the gentlemen upon the other side. When I tried to make an arrangement, and when the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] agreed to have a general debate of fifty minutes, thirty minutes of which was to be controlled by the other side and twenty minutes by this side, the gentleman from Alabama threw out a remark which raised the righteous indignation of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON], and then all attempts for an agreement on general debate ended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman will recognize the fact that we stated on this side that we desired an hour's debate. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas address the Chair?

Mr. RIDGELY. I will not at this time, Mr. Speaker, call for a separate vote; but I do ask, in view of the fact that we on this side have been denied the privilege of discussion, that I be allowed to print a letter and some remarks that I would have presented upon the bill had I been permitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks permission to print some remarks upon the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VANDIVER. I rise for the purpose of offering a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, a motion to recommit the bill with the following instructions.

Mr. FOSS. I reserve a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read for the information of the House and the Chair.

Mr. VANDIVER. Allow me to preface the motion by saying that it is not exactly the same proposition that we offered yesterday and which was ruled out of order. We offer this morning this motion on behalf of the minority members of the committee as a compromise, more particularly because some members of the minority thought it a better proposition and one not so likely to meet with disfavor, because it shows our intention to be reasonable and even abundantly liberal, so far as providing armor for the vessels now waiting for armor. I am directed by the minority to present this as a compromise or an alternative proposition. If you defeat it or strike it out on a point of order, you are responsible for leaving the vessels without the armor.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point that debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will report the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Armor and armament: Toward the armament and armor of domestic manufacture for the vessels authorized by act of March 2, 1895; for those authorized by the act of June 10, 1896; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1897; for those authorized by the act of May 4, 1898; for those authorized by the act of March 3, 1899, and for those authorized by this act, $4,000,000: Provided, That in contracts for armor plate for any of the vessels above mentioned, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to procure armor of the best quality at an average rate not to exceed $445 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties. If, after due advertisement, the Secretary of the Navy should be unable to contract for such armor designated above, then, and in that event, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to procure armor of the best quality for the battleships Maine, Ohio, and Missouri, now awaiting armor, and to pay therefor not to exceed $545 per ton of 2,240 pounds: Provided further, That if the Secretary of the Navy finds, after due advertisement, that armor plate of the best quality can not be purchased from private manufacturers of armor plate for $445 per ton of 2,240 pounds, then, and in that event, he is hereby directed to procure or purchase a suitable site and erect thereon an armor-plate factory, at a cost not to exceed $4,000,000; and to carry out the purposes of this provision the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated and made immediately available, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The following restriction, under the heading, "Armor and armament," in the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," namely, "And provided further, That no contract for the armor for any vessels authorized by this act shall be made at an average rate exceeding $300 per ton of 2,240 pounds, including royalties," is hereby removed, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to let the contracts for the vessels therein referred to, subject to all other requirements relating to the same as contained in said act of March 3, 1899, except as to sheathing and coppering, which is hereby made discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. FOSS. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move to recommit the bill with instructions to bring in a provision which is in violation of Rule XXI.

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to hear the question discussed, as he is ready to decide it.

This motion to recommit contains propositions which would not be in order if offered as amendments upon this bill in the Committee of the Whole or in the House. It has been long and well settled that there can not be referred to the committee, to be added to a bill as an amendment, a proposition which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the Committee of the Whole or the House. This rule has been established to prevent circuity of action. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order and declares the motion of the gentleman from Missouri out of order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the Chair allow me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided the question; and debate is not in order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. As the Chair has announced his decision on this question, I wish to know whether he would now entertain a motion to recommit generally, without instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made one motion to recommit; and only one such motion is in order.

Mr. VANDIVER. That motion was ruled out of order. A motion which is ruled out of order can not be considered as a motion offered under the rule.

The SPEAKER. On that view of the case the Chair is rather disposed to hold that a motion to recommit generally would be in order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. VANDIVER, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 55, noes 95.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. FOSS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10840) providing compensation to United States commissioners in Chinese deportation cases.

Whereas United States commissioners are by law required to take cognizance of Chinese deportation cases, issue warrants for their arrest, hear the cases, enter final judgment therein, and issue orders of deportation in case of final judgment that the Chinese person has no right to remain within the United States; and

Whereas there is no compensation provided by law, as held by the Attorney-General and the Auditor, for the hearing of such cases; and

Whereas there is no compensation provided by law for such orders of deportation: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall be allowed to the several commissioners of the United States for services in Chinese deportation cases the same fees and per diem as is now chargeable in criminal cases before them, and for an order of deportation the sum of $2 in each case, to be taxed and collected in the same manner as other accounts are now payable by law.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from the date of passage.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble.

Strike out, in lines 1 and 2, on page 2, the words "and for an order of deportation the sum of $2 in each case."

Strike out section 2.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that this bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. LANHAM. It is a unanimous report. The reasons for the passage of the bill are clearly stated in the preamble—to allow the United States commissioners compensation for services rendered in connection with the deportation of Chinese found unlawfully within the United States. The accounting officers of the Treasury have decided that under the existing law, such cases being held to be civil cases, they can not make any allowance of compensation for such services.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS OCMULGEE AND OCONEE RIVERS, GEORGIA.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10097) to authorize the Atlantic and Gulf Short Line Railroad Company to build, construct, and maintain railway bridges across the Ocmulgee and Oconee rivers within the boundary lines of Irwin, Wilcox, Telfair, and Montgomery counties, in the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read. It provides that the Atlantic and Gulf Short Line Railroad Company, a corporation duly incorporated and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Georgia, be and is authorized to construct, build, and maintain across the Ocmulgee River a railroad bridge for the passage of railroad engines and cars, at such point as may be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War, within Irwin, Wilcox, and Telfair counties, in the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARTLETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL, DELAWARE BAY.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9566) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to establish a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay, at a cost not exceeding $30,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WANGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER BIG SANDY RIVER BETWEEN WEST VIRGINIA AND KENTUCKY.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4051) to authorize the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Big Sandy River from Kenova, W. Va., to Catlettsburg, Ky.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be lawful for the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, to construct and maintain a bridge, and approaches thereto, over the Big Sandy River from a point in the town of Kenova, W. Va., to a point in the town of Catlettsburg, Ky.; that said bridge may be constructed to provide for the passage of railroad cars, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, foot passengers, and all kinds of commerce, travel, or communication; and said corporation may charge and receive reasonable tolls therefor, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and to such changes as he may think proper from time to time.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in order, being a Senate bill——

Mr. DALZELL. One moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the House committee reported a similar bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill, with a similar House bill reported by the House committee, carrying no appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The committee have reported the House bill unanimously.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, the corresponding House bill was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, had further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, and Mr. MORGAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his eminent public services and high personal character.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

AGNES K. CAPRON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 1906) granting an increase of pension to Agnes K. Capron, with a House amendment, disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. BROMWELL, and Mr. STANLEY W. DAVENPORT.

LILLIAN CAPRON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 1905) granting an increase of pension to Lillian Capron, with a House amendment, disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, Mr. BROMWELL, and Mr. STANLEY W. DAVENPORT.

SECTION 953, REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8366) to amend section 953 of the Revised Statutes, with a Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. JENKINS, Mr. KAHN, and Mr. TERRY.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 4604) to amend the charter of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the House agree to the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10449. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BISHOP, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CROMER, for ten days from April 23, on account of important business.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP GARONNE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3465) to provide an American register for the steamship Garonne.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would advise the gentleman from Washington that the Senate bill does not seem to be here. It has not come over from the Senate, and it has not been reported from the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee of the House reported a similar bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a House bill; but the Senate bill is not here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I supposed it was. It passed the Senate several days ago.

The SPEAKER. It has not been reported from the committee.

BROOKLYN FERRY COMPANY, OF NEW YORK.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 3535, which is on the Speaker's table. A similar bill has been reported by the House committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3535) for the relief of the Brooklyn Ferry Company, of New York.

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim against the United States of the Brooklyn Ferry Company, of New York, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, with its principal place of business in the borough of Brooklyn, city of New York, owner of the ferryboat New York, for damages caused by collision between the said ferryboat and the U. S. S. Dolphin, in the East River, near Brooklyn, on the 1st day of August, 1899, may be sued for by the said ferry company in the United States district court for the eastern district of New York sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such a suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages, if any shall be found to be due, against the United States in favor of the said ferry company, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs and interest, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney-General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear for and defend the United States.

SEC. 3. That should damages be found to be due the said ferry company, the amount of a final decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GAINES. What is this lawsuit about?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I would like to know what it is about?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad to make an explanation.

Mr. TERRY. Reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman to make an explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. In August, 1899, the Dolphin collided with the ferryboat New York in the harbor of New York. It is claimed by the ferry company that the accident was by the fault of the Dolphin. This bill permits the ferry company to prosecute their claim in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, and if the judgment is obtained by that company against the United States—and of course, in order to obtain a judgment, it must be established that the fault was with the Dolphin—then it appropriates the money to pay the damage.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman whether there was a board that examined into this matter. In the Revised Statutes there is a provision that a board shall take this matter into consideration and report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not that I am aware of. I am not sure about that.

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt that there was.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it has never been acted upon. That is my recollection; but I am not sure.

Mr. CANNON. Then they ought to exhaust their remedy. I will say there is a provision of law that applies to all this class of cases. It authorizes the appointment of a board to take into consideration as to whether there was negligence upon the part of the officers of the United States or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. A naval board was appointed, and that board exonerated the officers of the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. Then that is an end of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. The naval board always exonerates the naval officers. It is an ex parte board.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, they do not always exonerate them. Every session of Congress there come many findings that are appropriated for substantially as a matter of course, and that is the remedy; and this is the first time that I ever have heard of an action being brought like this. It is a mere claim, and ought not to be sent to the court, because the other remedy is provided, and they have resorted to the other remedy and failed.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. If the gentleman will permit me, the owners of this boat have no redress before this board. This board is appointed by the Navy Department to ascertain for the information of the Navy Department as to whether any of its officers are guilty of negligence. The owners of the vessel have no standing there. They have no opportunity to present their case, as they would in a court of law. This merely authorizes the district court of the southern district of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty, to determine the question.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. If the Dolphin had been owned by private individuals they could have gone to court and litigated the question between them; but as it is a Government boat it is necessary to have a special act.

Mr. TERRY. Does that bill come from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. SHERMAN. It comes from the Committee on Claims, which favorably reported a House bill. The Senate bill has not been reported to the House, but an identical House bill has been favorably reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say, touching this matter, for the reason referred to, and, in addition to that, the unheard-of thing of appropriating beforehand an indefinite appropriation to pay, the rule being if the United States has a judgment rendered against it that the judgment shall be certified, I feel quite sure that if this matter is looked into they have had their remedy and failed; and I do not want this bill to pass without time for carefully examining it.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

GOVERNMENT FOR HAWAII.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the Hawaiian conference bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, and asks for a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereto.

Ordered, That Mr. CULLOM, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, and Mr. MORGAN be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KNOX, Mr. HITT, and Mr. MOON.

BRIDGE ACROSS TALLAHATCHIE RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3934) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, Miss.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPIGHT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SPIGHT. I ask that House bill 9924 be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection.

STEAMSHIP GARONNE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries be discharged from the consideration of Senate bill 3465, to provide an American register for the steamship Garonne, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamship Garonne, owned by Charles Richardson, of Tacoma, State of Washington, and Frank Waterhouse, of Seattle, State of Washington, citizens of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the discharge of the House committee from the consideration of Senate bill 3465, just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman why this vessel can not be registered under the present law?

Mr. JONES of Washington. She can not be registered under the present law without a special act. The repairs on the vessel are almost equal to her full value; the repairs amount to about $50,000 and the value of the vessel is $60,000. I will say that in 1898 the vessel was engaged in the Alaska trade, carrying American goods from Victoria, under certificates of export given by the Department for exportation, to Vancouver and then to Alaska.

Afterwards it was decided that none of these certificates should be issued, and the representative of the owners of this vessel came here and arranged with the Treasury Department by which the objections could be obviated; and after they had secured 165 passengers and 800 tons of freight, the Treasury changed the ruling again and cut them out. The whole matter has been investigated by the Senate, and it passed unanimously. It has been investigated by our committee, and we think the equities are very strong. The report is very full and sets out all the facts. The Secretary of the Treasury recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Were the repairs made in an American shipyard?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; at Seattle.

Mr. PAYNE. She was never wrecked or anything of that kind?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No.

Mr. PAYNE. Simply a foreign vessel brought to an American shipyard and repaired?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but the special equities are very strong and her owners are Americans.

Mr. PAYNE. The special equities seem to be that the owner had some advantage over other foreign owners for being allowed under the Treasury regulations to engage in that trade.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; all vessels were allowed to engage in it; but the Treasury Department changed its ruling and said that they would not allow export certificates to issue. I will say that this vessel was chartered by the United States Government and the charter is about expiring.

Mr. PAYNE. For what purpose was she chartered?

Mr. JONES of Washington. To transport troops to the Philippine Islands. The report on this bill is long, but it will explain the whole matter fully. The Senate investigated it thoroughly, and it passed unanimously.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has the bill been reported from the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; unanimously.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill 10656, similar in character, lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks that the House bill 10656, similar in character, lie on the table. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE EVAN E. SETTLE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls attention of the House to the special order set for 1 o'clock, which is the eulogies upon the life and character of the late Representative SETTLE, of Kentucky, and will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. GAYLE.

Mr. GAYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended in order that suitable tribute be paid to the high character and eminent public services of the Hon. EVAN E. SETTLE, late a distinguished member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased statesman.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, before these eulogies begin, I ask that gentlemen who have desired to speak on this occasion and who are now absent may be permitted to print their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAYLE. Mr. Speaker, the sad duty devolves upon me of supplementing the resolutions just offered with a brief summary of my predecessor's short but remarkable career.

Born in Franklin County, Ky., in the year 1848, the earlier years of his life were spent in the cities of Frankfort and Louisville, Ky. He graduated from the Louisville Male High School at the age of 18, and immediately came to Owenton, Owen County, Ky., to begin the battle of life. He accepted the position of deputy county clerk, and a year later, by a special act of the Kentucky legislature, he was granted license to practice law.

His unusual ability as a lawyer, combined with his extreme youth, attracted immediate attention, and he was soon the acknowledged leader of the Owenton bar. For thirty years he followed successfully the practice of law and was considered one of the most powerful advocates of his State. He served two terms as county prosecuting attorney and was elected for a third term, but resigned to accept a seat in the Kentucky legislature, where he served with distinction for two terms. In 1894 he became a candidate for Congress—virtually forced into the race by those who knew and admired his ability and recognized his peculiar fitness for the office. Although defeated, he had conducted his canvass on such a high plane as to thoroughly win the admiration and respect of his district, and the Democratic nomination for the Fifty-fifth Congress was procured with but little effort.

As a proof of the high esteem in which he was held by his party, the nomination for the Fifty-sixth Congress was given him without opposition. He represented a district that for more than half a century had been famous for the illustrious statesmen it had furnished. The eloquence of its Representatives had become proverbial. More was expected from the member from the "Old Ashland" district because of the fame of those who had gone before.

I shall leave to those who were with him in the Fifty-fifth Congress to say how well he sustained the reputation of his district during his short career. There are few men that I can recall that, for so short a period of service in national politics, were more extraordinary than EVAN E. SETTLE. A man of the highest order of intellect, quick, discriminating, comprehensive. Possessing all the attractiveness of the orator, the impressions he made were deep and lasting. His memory was retentive, his voice clear and ringing, and his delivery pleasant, his manner and general bearing attractive, and his personal appearance in any assembly would command attention. His addresses on this floor and at the banquet tendered Governor Roosevelt at Chicago were sufficient to place his name on the national roster of orators.

It is a peculiarly sad thought to contemplate the death of one so well fitted to render his country great service. Standing upon the threshold of a brilliant career; endowed with a strength and robustness of brain and body that gave him confidence in himself and his ability to gratify his highest ambition in public life; surrounded by a family he adored; firmly established in the hearts of his people, he confidently anticipated triumphs yet to be. His constant and exhausting labors for his party in the late bitter campaign in Kentucky had just ended—labors that had doubly endeared him to his party associates. He had just returned to his home for a few days' rest before coming to Washington to enter upon his official duties when he received a higher summons to "come up hither." He passed away so suddenly, so unexpectedly, that we who knew and loved him best can even now scarcely realize that he is no more.

We buried him in the little cemetery on a hill overlooking his modest home, among the scenes of his youth and early manhood, near those whom in life he loved so well, beneath the sod of his beloved "Sweet Owen;" and, though his career was finished before it was well begun, we feel that his life has not been in vain. The sphere of his influence will extend beyond the grave, and others with whom the battle of life is not easy and the prospect at the beginning is not bright will learn from his life that true merit will win and that wealth is not always essential to political success.

While the nation and his native State mourn his untimely death, it is upon his family that the severest blow has fallen. Whatever can be said of EVAN E. SETTLE as lawyer, orator, and statesman, pales when compared with him as husband and father. It was only at his own fireside that his full measure could be taken. He was never happier than when surrounded by his loving wife and interesting children, and no days of labor ever so worried him, no problem ever so vexed him, that his mind and heart turned not to them, and a smile of peace wreathed his face when he heard the prattle of his little ones as his shadow fell across the threshold of his happy home.

May the "Father of the fatherless and the Judge of the widows" be with them and comfort them.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not usual for me to speak on such occasions in this House, nor would I make mere formal offering now, but with gratitude and love for a true and valued friend, "faithful and just to me," I would render heartfelt tribute to the memory of EVAN E. SETTLE. Should it be the will of Heaven that I must be gathered to my fathers while serving in this high place, I would that no man should speak in my funeral or eulogy, save as moved by like sentiments of affection and sorrow.

Prior to our association in the Fifty-fifth Congress, which we entered together, I had no personal acquaintance with Mr. SETTLE. True, his reputation had been established as an able campaigner and eminent lawyer, but of his private character and personal history I knew nothing. Our acquaintance, however, rapidly ripened into friendship, which deepened and strengthened until the end of his life. I was frequently his guest, and to him and his delightful family, loved by him with a devoted self-effacement next to adoration, I became indebted for many happy and profitable hours, his ready and varied learning, equipping and enriching the most splendid common sense, rendering his suggestions valuable on all important questions. Modest and reserved, yet vigilant and zealous, he asserted his own rights and protected the interests of those whom he represented. Studious and industrious, giving attention to substance as well as taste and style, he was eloquent and ornate without sacrifice of logic, sense, or force. Scrupulously correct and decorous in his intercourse with others, he was too magnanimous to offend the weakest, while his dauntless nobility of soul would defy and despise the strongest if that strength dared attempt wrong or oppression.

It is often the misfortune of greatness to shrink and dwarf on near approach, but he was one of the few really great men I have ever known who appeared better and greater with longer and better acquaintance. He would have been at home in the ideal Congress described by the satirist as—

> The honored scene
> Of patriot deeds, where men of solemn mien,
> In virtue strong, in understanding clear,
> Earnest though courteous, and though smooth sincere,
> To gravest counsels lent the teeming hours,
> And gave their country all their mighty powers.

Well do I remember the fateful day when the sad tidings of his death came, too late for me to reach his funeral, and how my soul went out in sympathy to his stricken family, most sorely bereaved by a loss irreparable to us all. Most deeply do I lament the seemingly untimely death which cut him down in the flower of his manhood and the meridian of his usefulness; but we ought more deeply to thank God that he lived, and no doubt accomplished the mission whereunto he was sent as completely as erring mortals ever do; for I am persuaded that his life was well spent, and with the approval of Heaven he was called home in God's own time, leaving precepts, example, and achievements as a rich legacy not only to those near and dear to him, but to all his countrymen, whom he loved with patriotic fervor worthy of imitation, for next to the God he adored he loved his fellow-man.

His brief but brilliant career was at once a vivid revelation and an enduring object lesson to inculcate every manly virtue, and in living, quenchless light blazon the strength and beauty of lofty patriotism and spotless public character. His short but devoted life in the family circle was a benediction to his loved ones which will sustain, encourage, and bless his latest posterity. His example will lend inspiration to our youths to choose the paths of industry and integrity as the unfailing avenues to success and honor. His public course presents a perfect model for the study and emulation of statesmen. Untiring and insatiate in searching for knowledge, he always discriminated in its acquisition and use, verifying the proverb:

> Give instruction to a wise man and he will be yet wiser; teach a just man and he will increase in learning.

Nor did he limit his knowledge nor confine his affection to the sordid and fleeting concerns of this life. He realized that "it is not all of life to live nor all of death to die;" that this ephemeral existence could not be the end of man. His whole life beamed forth "the wisdom that is from above"—"first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy."

With his sorrowing widow and children I share and mourn his loss, but with them I glory in the life that he lived, radiant and teeming with truth, benevolence, and virtue, and rejoice unutterably that he trod "the path of the just," which "is as a shining light that shineth more and more into the perfect day."

Dear and honored friend, farewell, but not forever! Thy life has only begun. Though thy star has faded from earthly skies, it has already arisen to shine on a fairer shore.

Bright be the place of thy soul;
No lovelier spirit than thine
Ere burst from its mortal control
In the realms of the blessed to shine.

May others like unto thee arise to teach and lead our people, glorify our Republic, and exalt our race.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, EVAN E. SETTLE was my friend, and I approach the subject of his eulogy fully conscious of one's weakness when he speaks of friend. I loved him, as all did who knew him well. Were I to select my close and early associates in the Fifty-fifth Congress, he would be among the first.

Our association and mutual friendship bound us together with "hoops of steel" and enabled me to know him as he was and to learn those qualities that made his life that success "which fate reserves for a bright manhood." His career will remain an inspiration to the young. Not blessed with the favors of fortune, he won his way to a good education, and before he was of age entered the profession of law and graced it with his eloquence and ability till his death.

He was honored by his people in ways befitting his high character—as county attorney, as member of the State legislature, as delegate to the Democratic national convention at St. Louis in 1888, and last was honored with a seat in Congress.

From that time on I knew him, and in feelings shared the glory of his triumphs and success, for I regarded him as a brother.

Mr. SETTLE was early able to make his mark in the House of Representatives, and gain an influence not usually accorded to a first-term member. He justified the favors and confidence shown him.

Though a partisan, and by his assignment on the Election Committee compelled to argue partisan questions on the floor in a partisan way, yet he never uttered a word or sentiment—and I call every member here to witness—that stirred up party feelings in his discussions. Much of this was due to the personality of the man.

Mr. SETTLE was an orator among the orators of Kentucky, which State has furnished so many of finished culture.

He was in demand at all manner of public speakings, and with a special devotion to his church he raised his eloquent voice on many occasions in Kentucky in her behalf.

On the 1st day of June, 1898, on occasion of the Congress sweeping away the last vestige of political disabilities growing out of the war of the rebellion, Mr. SETTLE shed a luster on one of the happiest incidents of legislation of the memorable Fifty-fifth Congress. He uttered these beautiful sentiments:

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Speaker, I think when the permanent RECORD of this day's session is made up it would be incomplete indeed if some Representative from the South, some man who is supposed to be in sympathy with the Southern people in their present and their past relations to the General Government, did not avail himself of the opportunity to respond to the generous sentiments that have been uttered on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentlemen from Iowa and Wisconsin in the conduct of this bill to-day, for notwithstanding we may all say this is a just bill and ought to have become a law years ago, yet we from the South must agree that it is none the less a generous bill; and Southern Representatives should not hesitate so to declare in their places here, for had we been the victors we might not have been so generous as they.

This bill is but the culmination of the course of events that have been gradually approaching this point for ten or fifteen years past. I have seen it in the present session. I have heard the great battle hymn of the South—"Dixey"—receive as generous applause in Northern capitals as was accorded to the "Star-Spangled Banner" and "Marching Through Georgia." And it came not from Southern sympathizers, but from the generous people of the North, who took that occasion to say, in this way, to their brethren at the South, "We embrace you and have learned to forget all past differences." [Applause.]

I happened to be at a down-town theater the other evening. In the interval between the acts it has become the custom not to go out, but to remain and hear the orchestra discourse patriotic anthems and airs. After the band had ceased playing some gentleman arose and proposed "Three cheers for McKinley." The vast audience gave them with a will. Then three cheers were proposed for Dewey, the hero of Manila, which were also responded to. And then some gentleman, whom I took to be a military officer of rank, arose in his place, and, waving his hand in the air, said, "Three cheers for a united country!" Gentlemen, that sentiment caught me, and it caught that vast house. [Applause.]

I thank God that I have lived to see this day. We sometimes thought that the great war between the States was an unmitigated evil, but in the providence of God it, accompanied by other agencies, has proved to be a great blessing. That war was not of chance or of accident. It came as the winds come and as the storms come and as all things else come—in response to the eternal purposes and behests of Him who "holds the wind in His fist and the hearts of men in the hollow of His hand." [Applause.]

The beginning of the war was the acme of that sectional hate which had been growing and increasing in bitterness for thirty years. The North had no love for the South, and the South had no respect for the North. The conflict was irrepressible. The world looked on at the magnificent display of courage and fortitude exhibited through four years of battle and strife, and while one rebel could not, as he thought at the beginning, wipe out five "Yankees," the sequel showed that he could put them to considerable exertion. [Laughter and applause.]

When valor and courage and endurance shall no longer command the praise of men, when tribute shall be denied to those who endured privation without complaint and suffered all manner of sacrifices without murmur, then we might hesitate to unroll the curtain of that past and let its scenes pass in panorama before us. But Heaven forbid in this day, when one touch of nature has made us all akin, that I should fear in this presence to hold up for admiration the prowess of the gallant boys in the trenches and the field, wearing the blue or wearing the gray, who gave to the cause of their country their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. [Applause.]

But the end came at last. These Southern knights went down to their home, and many of them can not be reached by any provision of earthly statute now.

"Many of those good knights are dust—
Their good swords rust,
Their souls are with the saints, we trust."

They went down to their desolated homes and despoiled fields, and without complaint they set about the task, the herculean task, of rebuilding those waste places and restoring their ancient splendor. Her sons laid down their arms in good faith, and in the same spirit they laid their hearts upon the altar of their country and took their step to the music of the Union. I do not believe, gentlemen, that the American people were ever so united as they are to-day. The men who stayed at home were the last to forgive, but the men who fought have always been the first to forget. [Applause.]

And now we are hastened to this era of good times by the war in which we find ourselves involved. We shall free Cuba, but we shall do more than that. We shall free ourselves. The greatest of English poets, in speaking of the divine quality of mercy, has said that—

"It is twice blest:
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

If we shall confer a gracious boon upon the people of that unhappy island, we shall receive a blessing from Heaven, such perhaps as we may not be able to contain. Out of this baptism of fire and blood wherewith we are now being baptized we shall come forth, I doubt not, new men and new women, clean every whit, with sectional hate and sectional bitterness clean gone forever. [Applause.]

That were a consummation devoutly to be wished; that were the summum bonum, the great desideratum; that were well worth all the treasure we may expend and all the blood that may be shed. In the language of the great Kentucky editor, this war has already forever eliminated the sectional contest. There are thousands of old Confederates who are to-day happy in the thought that before they have been called to join the silent bivouac of the dead they have seen the North and the South united in battle array beneath the Stars and Stripes.

"Flag of the free heart's hope and home!
By angel hands to valor given!
Thy stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven."

[Applause.]

The applause that greeted these patriotic sentiments were alike complimentary to the orator and to the members of the House. This Southern flame that warmed the hearts of all patriots on that day should be embalmed and perpetuated in this form and in the hearts of his countrymen as fitting gems of thought and patriotism, sparkling with the personal traits of the man and sustaining his fame and eulogy.

In private life and in his public career his inspirations and aspirations were noble and manly and his record, thus molded, for statesmanship, unsullied honor, ability as a debater, eloquence as an orator, geniality and lovable spirit as a man, may well be pointed to with pride in years to come by his loved ones and by his associates and friends.

Brilliant as were his talents, eloquent as an orator, able as a lawyer, yet he shone the brightest in his family circle and in the circle of his friends. Modest and unassuming in his manners, yet he never did things by halves. Ardent in his labors, able and well equipped, he yielded to the demands of his party in Kentucky with his usual fidelity, and labored beyond human power till the end of the campaign in November, 1899, then succumbed and died, a sacrifice to the cause of his party.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, there is an old proverb, sometimes misused, that bids us say naught but good of the dead. To me it seems that reverence for the dead, the affectionate regard which bids us to forget their faults and commemorate their virtues; the kindly sympathies that go from all good men and women to those who stand beside a new-made grave, are among the redeeming traits of our all too human lives. I have sometimes thought that the crush of our daily work in this rough world was apt to obscure the finer sensibilities of men. We too frequently veil sympathy behind indifference. We too frequently are accustomed to mask our love as though it were a fault. But in the presence of great sorrow these false growths are brushed aside and eyes that look through tears see with a clearer vision, and hearts that have throbbed with sorrow beat in kindlier unison.

It seems to me a fitting thing that, when the stern angel of the bitter cup has pressed the sleeping potion to the lips of one who so lately moved and wrought among us, we should take a few brief hours from the press of business to embalm here in the record of our daily work the memory of his deeds and the tribute of our respect.

It was my good fortune in the lottery for seats in the Fifty-fifth

Congress to find that I was seated next to EVAN E. SETTLE, of Kentucky, and as by that enforced proximity a chance acquaintance ripened into friendship I grew more and more to bless kind fortune that had given me such a neighbor.

You all remember, who were here at that time, the extra session, occupied as it was upon a single measure and with tedious adjournments, gave but little opportunity to test the mettle of the men that came then for the first time to the House; and yet I well remember how, on the dull, dry question of how many days the House could adjourn without the consent of the Senate, Mr. SETTLE made a speech of such interest and force that it attracted at once the attention of the older and more observant members of the House. And later—in the succeeding session—when his kindly spirit found more congenial opportunity in the discussion on the bill referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]—the bill providing for the removal of political disabilities of those who had taken part in the civil strife—he burst forth into such eloquent words that his place was at once fixed both in the minds of those who heard him and in the hearts of all his countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I do no injustice to the living when I say that of all the men who came first to the House in the Fifty-fifth Congress no man at its close left it occupying a higher place in the minds of those who had met him on the floor and in the hearts of the people of the country than the man whose untimely death we mourn to-day.

It is as true now as when the Roman said it, that orators are born, not made. And there was something in this man—something other than the pleasing presence he possessed; something other than the keen logic that saw through the subtleties of every proposition; something other than that grace of diction that seemed to find always the fittest phrase and the most eloquent expression—there was still that undefinable something which, reaching out to the minds and hearts of his audience, told them when he rose he was one of those who had a message to deliver.

I do not remember ever to have heard him take part in those rancorous and acrimonious political debates that sometimes occur on the floor of this House. I never thought his was one of those spirits that loved to "ride the storm;" while he did not shun, he did not seek controversy. I always thought his genial soul found its more fitting sphere in those occasions that not unfrequently occur when men lay aside political partisanship and rise to that broader plane of a common and united citizenship.

Mr. Speaker, it occurred to me as I watched his career here in the House—knowing as I did his power of speech, and knowing also that he enjoyed the duller, but not less necessary work of the committee—that there lay before him a broad field of future usefulness. And knowing also as I did the genial, social spirit of the man that loved so well that meeting here in friendly intercourse that forms, as we all know, the fairest portion of Congressional life, it seemed to me that in the atmosphere which surrounded him here he would meet the best fruition of his powers.

But his experience has been, alas, that which too frequently meets us in this world. The hard-won prizes come too late. The apple turns to ashes on the lip. The flower fades in the plucking. The curtain falls before the actor hears the plaudits of those he sought to please. EVAN SETTLE's work is done. I trust that I shall not here offend the proprieties with undue laudation; but I do feel that every man that knew him in this life will join with me in saying, whatever may have been his faults, he was the highest type of a Christian gentleman in its truest and best sense—a gentleman. In two years of daily intercourse I never heard fall from his lips one word that might not have been uttered in the presence of wife or daughter.

Mr. Speaker, what rests for us beyond the grave we do not know. No man's eye has ever penetrated the mysteries which shroud the tomb.

> Yet love will dream, and Faith will trust,
> (Since He who knows our need is just),
> That somehow, somewhere, meet we must.

And in that meeting place of noble souls I believe there will still be found God's work for manly men and loving women, and in that place and in that work I believe EVAN E. SETTLE is to-day taking a gracious and a generous part.

Mr. Speaker, for the love I bore him living, for the fragrant memory I cherish of him dead, I come to render this poor tribute of my affection and respect to-day.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay tribute to the memory of our departed colleague, EVAN E. SETTLE, and it becomes me as one who in life called him friend, and who now loves his memory, to find as best I can the words that will fitly and aptly ascribe to him the virtues he possessed and the rare gifts with which he was endowed.

I am painfully conscious of the paucity of the language at my command for this purpose and of my inability to do even the simplest justice to the name he left behind him, and yet I am sustained in my undertaking by the knowledge that his memory will ever live in the hearts of those who knew him, and that no charm of rhetoric or melody of speech can brighten it, or even picture it, as it glows and lives within us.

He has "gone before to that unknown and silent shore," and I mourn his removal from among us, and because I mourn I seek now to add my own weak tribute to the eloquent words that have already been so earnestly spoken concerning him.

When the wires a few short months ago flashed across our land the announcement of his death there came to all who knew him a sense of loss and pain akin to the shock of a personal bereavement. It was fitly so, for none knew him but to love him, and none knew him but then and now mourn his untimely end.

When we left him at the close of the Fifty-fifth Congress he was possessed of his full, manly vigor, and, as we supposed, with long years of usefulness and of honor before him. He had been reelected to this Congress, and here we expected to find him upon our return.

Little did we know that his days had then been numbered, and that the end was nearly reached, and that never more would he answer to the roll call of this House.

Our ignorance there but again confirms the oft-repeated lesson that mortal man is not in the confidence of the Giver of life and death, and knoweth not what decrees He has entered or when they will be enforced. We are again admonished to keep our houses in order and to be ready for the final summons to us.

The great ability and superb oratory of Mr. SETTLE were permitted to illumine but one Congress, and yet in that brief space of time he was allowed to achieve as much of fame and renown as comes to some in many terms, and more than ever comes to many others. The compensating law of an all-wise Providence is here, as everywhere, disclosed, if we but seek to find it.

I well remember his first appearance in an extended debate. The occasion was a contested-election case that had been reported from the committee of which he was a member. When he arose to speak, his intellectual face and clear, clean-cut features and attractive presence at once claimed the attention of the House. His opening sentences chained that attention to him, and there it remained until he had concluded.

I can recall now the music of his sweetly modulated voice and the rhythm of his well-chosen words as he constructed sentence after sentence of masterful logic, of keenest satire, and of eloquent and polished periods. That speech established his reputation as an orator and won for him a place in the front ranks of the great debaters of the House—a place which he retained and from which he would have gone to higher stations yet had not death's icy hand laid claim upon him.

We mourn that his eloquent tongue is forever silenced; we miss the charm and the spell of his rare oratory, and we miss his wise counsel in our deliberations; but more than these things we miss and mourn him.

Few men were better gifted than he in the art of making and holding friends. He was warm and generous in his nature and as gentle and sympathetic as a woman. Full of dignity, he was ever tender, yielding, and approachable. His was a strong nature, and yet one that was not formed in a rough and rugged mold. He did not display but concealed his strength in an affable and polished bearing.

Always of pronounced convictions, he was slow to obtrude them, and was ever charitable to the opinions of those with whom he disagreed; but loyalty to his convictions and his friends was a part of his nature.

His high character, his charming personality, his graceful manner, his delightful comradeship—these are the things that in the solemnity of this occasion come close to our hearts.

Fashioned as he was, it was but natural that he should draw men to him and hold them there with hooks of steel. The hold that he had upon the hearts of men still lives, though he is gone from among them.

It was not my privilege to know him until I met him here at the opening of the last Congress. Until that time his life and mine had never touched; and yet as he lived and moved among us I saw enough of him to come within the charmed circle of his influence, and I was proud to know him and to claim him as my friend. I saw enough of him to appreciate his worth, and to know that no truer or more ideal Representative ever sat in this Chamber, and none who better illustrated here the great State to which he claimed allegiance. Possessed of the chivalrous manhood and the lofty patriotism inherent in his own people, he not only adorned this body but he was ever ready to do and to die in the defense of those he served. Indeed, it was at the feet of Kentucky, in battling, as he believed, for the preservation of her institutions and her ideals, that he laid down his life.

It was when flushed with victories and while reveling in his own great strength, surrounded by loved ones, that "God's finger touched him, and he slept."

Sorrow ever follows in the wake of death; but when the strong man becomes the victim, how pitiably weak is all human strength revealed! How infinitely sad to see the hope of family and of country cut down! How distressing to behold dependent ones bind up their bleeding hearts and seek elsewhere for guidance and for strength!

It is not for us, however, to inquire into the ways of Providence. We must bow in humble submission to the Divine will. Our colleague sleeps the eternal sleep; and while we can not arouse him, we can, from the life he lived, draw lessons of duty, of patriotism, and of love and, thus inspired, carry on the work in which his labors shared.

He sleeps, and no rude sound of jarring faction or clashing contention disturbs him. No pain of doubt or fear annoys him. No disappointment or failure threatens him. No weariness of body or of brain can reach him. Calmly and peacefully he slumbers, and earthly ills and earthly cares are not about him. His rest has come—a sacred, hallowed rest for heart and hand and brain—a sweet and everlasting rest.

We say to him now, "Nobly you lived and bravely you died, and while we miss you and need you, we would not if we could interrupt the peace and happiness that you have so fairly won. We would not bring you back to toil and strive again. You have kept the faith and paid the last great debt, and the crown of immortality is yours. We bid you wear it, while we with unconcealed grief mourn your absence and sing requiems of praise to the peerless and priceless memory that you have left behind for us to cherish and revere."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Judge SETTLE and I were both new members and both placed on the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the last Congress. That committee was very busy at the session of Congress commencing two years ago last December. It had a number of hotly contested cases before it. Judge SETTLE was a new Democratic member, and I was a new Republican member.

We faced each other across the table, and we soon became congenial spirits. I think that our friendly relationship might properly have been termed affectionate. I grew to have a great admiration for him as well as a great fondness. I thought I saw in him a wonderful ability, both oratorically and intellectually. And when at one time, in the winter during the short session of last year, Mr. Hope Reed Cody, the brilliant young president of the Hamilton Club, of Chicago, was in Washington and said to me that the Hamilton Club was preparing to give a great nonpartisan banquet in celebration of Appomattox day and that he wished to obtain the finest speaker possible from the South to respond to the toast, "Robert E. Lee," the thought of SETTLE instantly came to my mind, and I said to Mr. Cody at once, "I think I know the very man whom you want." I went into the House, which was in session, and asked Mr. SETTLE if he would come out and meet a very dear friend of mine. We went out, and I introduced them. They were both most brilliant and most lovable men.

They seemed to almost fall in love with each other at sight.

Cody stated the circumstances and asked Mr. SETTLE if he would make the speech which was desired. The Judge said that he would; and he afterwards told me that he could not resist the winning way of Mr. Cody, although he did not see how it would be possible for him to keep his engagement without great trouble for himself. Probably the most triumphant appearance of his life was at that banquet. It was held in the immense hall of the Auditorium Building in Chicago. The parquet had been floored over on a level with the stage for the banquet tables. Nearly a thousand banqueters were present, while the balance of the hall was filled with upward of 2,000 other guests of the club—both ladies and gentlemen. It was the most impressive banquet that I have ever witnessed.

Gen. John C. Black, the gifted orator of Illinois, responded to the toast on General Grant in a brilliant speech. Judge SETTLE was not well known to the audience and not so much was expected of him. But he soon had completely captured it. His magnificent oration was the address of the evening. He had the audience in complete sympathy with him after the first sentences. As he proceeded the building rang with applause and approval. The heart of his audience seemed to reach out and embrace with sweetened thought the memory of the devoted commander of the Confederate armies. His speech was, of course, a prepared and written one, though he did not read it.

The most remarkable scene I have ever witnessed in a public assemblage occurred during its delivery. The speaker had been referring, of course, to the great conflict both of thought and of arms between the North and the South; and the renewed expression of reconciliation growing out of and accompanying the Spanish war, when turning aside from his prepared effort and looking into the faces of his expectant and admiring audience, he said with a wonderful depth of love and pathos in commencing a new sentence: "My brothers." The whole audience seemed at once as if by an electric shock to feel the inspiration of the sentiment of brotherhood. The entire gathering arose, as if one man, with cheers and shouts of approval and the waving of handkerchiefs and napkins, with the light of responsive love gleaming out of the faces of all and tears streaming down the cheeks of many. It was a sight never to be forgotten and never to be seen again. The tenderness of the expression of the speaker was so touching, the clear response of the audience was so instantaneous that the very air seemed to thrill and throb.

No man ever made a greater impression upon an audience anywhere. It seems to me now as though he had poured his life out into that speech. He was a man from the South who had come into the North to defend the memory of the one who had led the forces of the South in battle against many of the men whom he was to address. He was to speak about a lost cause, which the North had crushed at great loss of its blood and treasure. But he did not come with an apology. He was true to the memory of those who had been defeated and still truer to the reunited people. His address in Chicago endeared him to the people there. It added to their feeling of affection for the South. If he had lived, Chicago would have insisted upon hearing from him often again. But he has gone beyond. Cody, the gifted young leader who brought him to our city, went almost at the same time.

The world could ill afford to spare either of them. But their memory and works are left us. What they did is an inspiration for our future. We must, with others, assume the burdens which they would have helped to carry. Let us try to emulate the sweetness of their temper, the brightness of their smile, the gladsomeness of their greeting, the intensity of their patriotism, the strength of their character, and the nobility of their souls. In loving admiration we still hold them in our hearts and minds.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. Speaker, if the present service in which the former associates of EVAN EVANS SETTLE are engaged were to constitute an essential part of the record of his virtues, the little that I might hope thus to contribute to perpetuate his memory would perhaps cause me to refrain from speaking; but I am conscious of the fact that however comprehensive the eulogium or elegant the diction in which it is couched, the real, the lasting, the ineffable record of the life and character of our departed friend has been formed by himself upon the hearts and in the lives of others. It was not my good fortune to have known him well in early life. Indeed, my intimate acquaintance with him, which soon developed into sentiments of personal friendship, began when we met as colleagues in this House.

Although we did not agree in political matters, I was not long in discovering that in his magnanimous nature political differences constituted no barrier to the most cordial social relations, and being the only Republican colleague of his from Kentucky who now holds a seat on this floor, I should feel untrue to myself and false to that friendship if I should fail to bear testimony in some way to his great merit. Versed with the powers of oratory that few men possess, yet modest, unassuming, unaffected, the very essence of simplicity and sincerity, he soon won his way to the hearts and high esteem of his associates. Skilled in the arts of an accomplished advocate, he disdained all manner of empiricism. With steadfast, patriotic purpose he sought for the truth in matters involving the welfare of the community, and at all times had the courage of his conviction. His soul was cast in too liberal a mold to suffer him to temporize for passing effect.

It has been said that "crime is a curse only to the period in which it is successful; but virtue, whether fortunate or otherwise, blesses not only its own age but remotest posterity, and is as beneficial by its example as by its immediate effects." The faults and frailties of men perish with them, while the good they do lives on and is multiplied through successive ages. Hence the service of this hour, a privilege cherished by us who loved him well, is, after all, the discharge of a public rather than a personal duty.

He whose untimely loss gives occasion to our tributes was essentially self-made. Born to poverty, an orphan in childhood, struggling unaided against adverse surroundings, his intrinsic merit early manifested itself. His innate love for his fellow-man, his tender sympathy for the disappointed, the distressed, and the afflicted, coupled with an unusual personal magnetism, drew to him a lucrative clientage and an invaluable support, inseparable throughout his career. As a lawyer and as an official he soon achieved marked distinction, always retained and ever increasing; but the beautiful story of his life clusters about his hearthstone, his social and religious associations. Eminently domestic, self-sacrificing, and considerate, a companionable husband, an exemplary father, in the very noontide of vigorous manhood, when "his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated," he was suddenly summoned to the last final awakening, and, without fear or murmur, passed into "that port where all may find refuge from the storms of life."

Reverting for a moment to that misty Sabbath day and the scenes connected with the last sad rites: One glimpse at the overcrowded church where he had for years been a faithful worshiper the wilderness of floral offerings about the open casket, the wreathed and vacant chair in which he was wont to sit with closed eyes while leading the choir in sacred song, the saddened faces of neighbors in the different walks of life, the tenderly touching tributes of family and friends, told it all as tongue can not tell.

He is gone. We deeply deplore his loss. We long in vain for "the touch of the vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." Such, nevertheless, is death; and yet—

Death is the crown of life:
Were death denied, poor man would live in vain.
Death wounds to cure; we fall, we rise, we reign;
Spring from our fetters, fasten to the skies,
Where blooming Eden withers from our sight.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.

Then rest, dear friend, in peace; the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, Hon. EVAN SETTLE was born December 1, 1848. His life was passed in Kentucky, where he died November 16, 1899. He was educated in the best schools of his State, and when but 17 years old began the study of law, for which he had a natural adaptability. At the age of 19 years he was admitted to the bar by special act of the legislature, and soon took a good position in his profession. He represented the Seventh Congressional district of Kentucky, one that had been made famous by Henry Clay, Marshall, John C. Breckinridge, John J. Crittenden, James P. Beck, Joseph C. Blackburn, and W. P. C. Breckinridge, all of whom had enjoyed national reputations.

His service in local positions and his brilliant career in the Kentucky legislature fitted him for the position of Congressman. His ability was soon recognized by associates upon this floor in the Fifty-fifth Congress. He stood for reelection to the Fifty-sixth Congress and was chosen by an overwhelming majority. Our districts border upon each other, and we often addressed the same audiences, composed of about equal numbers of our constituency. I know, therefore, in what high esteem he was held by his people, and our homes were not distant.

After the adjournment sine die of the Fifty-fifth Congress and the members were scattered over the country seeking relaxation and pleasure, EVAN SETTLE returned with his family to his home at Owenton. He was then the picture of health and manly vigor, the pride of the people he had so faithfully represented. His interesting family were gathered around him, and happiness reigned in his household.

In the month of June the Democratic convention assembled at Louisville to nominate a State ticket. Mr. SETTLE was there representing "Sweet Owen," as his county is called, and after a struggle such as was never seen in Kentucky before a ticket was named. He at once announced his intention of canvassing the State for his party's interests, and immense crowds assembled whenever he was announced to speak. He gained new laurels in this canvass and added very much to his reputation as an orator, being far the most able of the canvassers in the State upon either side.

He never wearied in the work, sometimes speaking twice a day during the hot months of August and September, so that when the exciting canvass was closed he was broken down, and it was but a few days until the icy hand of death touched his noble heart. The statesman and orator and the loving husband and devoted father was gone.

He was generous and brave, full of life, and for many years before his death was an earnest Christian, being a leader in the Baptist Church, delivering lectures to aid in paying the debt upon the church to which he belonged, and as his family grew up around him devoted much of his time to their improvement.

He believed in that stanza of the poet—

Home is not simply four straight walls
Hung with frames and pictures gilded;
Home is where affection calls,
Home is where the heart has builded.

When his sudden death was announced, I determined to attend his funeral. A short ride of an hour from Newport, Ky., brought us to Sparta, a station upon the railroad, from whence the Congressional party in carriages started for Owenton, the home of Mr. SETTLE, 12 miles away.

Already the community showed evidences of sincere regret. A long line of vehicles were gathered, but the real evidence of mourning was not manifested until we approached the town. For many miles around from his own and from my district the best people had assembled by the thousand, in spite of inclement weather, to pay respect to his memory, because they admired, yes, loved him; men and women, black and white, were gathered there to do honor to this tribune of the people.

The laity mingled with the ministers of the gospel in praising the character of the deceased. For the usual church exercises on such occasions memorial services were instituted, and lawyers, politicians, and his associates in all the walks of life raised their voices in his praise. I have never seen such deep distress at a funeral. His loving family clung about the coffin with touching sorrow, and his little son, as the lid was placed upon the casket, closing out his father's face forever, exclaimed "Good-bye, papa!" At that moment there was scarcely a dry eye in that assembled multitude, nor a heart that was not touched with the dramatic separation of father and son. It was heartrending, and I shall long remember the scene. We extend to his lonely widow and distressed family our profoundest sympathy and trust that Providence will smile upon this fatherless household.

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I do not arise for the purpose of giving a biographical sketch of Hon. EVAN E. SETTLE, of Kentucky. That the man was born; that he died; and that while living he was honored with public office by the people of his community is true of every man upon whom a eulogy is delivered in the halls of Congress. I want to send a message to the friends who loved him in his native State that we also loved him. I want to send a message, not of condolence, but of warm sympathy. EVAN E. SETTLE was a lawyer, a statesman, and an orator. He might have been even a greater lawyer, a greater statesman, and a more fervid orator, and yet have been less loved.

It is, therefore, not a tribute to the lawyer or the statesman, but one to the comrade and friend that I wish to deliver to-day. Throughout his early life as a boy in Frankfort, in his young manhood in Kentucky, and in middle life, until his lips were touched by the frosty fingers of the Angel of Death and his heart was stilled, no man ever yet went to EVAN E. SETTLE with an appeal to his friendship who appealed in vain. A foemen who might well be dreaded in the court room or on the hustings, yet a companion even to his opponents, anywhere and everywhere always welcome. Nature endowed him with a great brain, too great to discover the faults of his friends, too great to harbor enmity for those who opposed him.

His heart was so full of the love for others that there was no room for love of self, and at the close of an active life he died poor because he could not withhold any favor which might be asked of him or withstand the pleadings of others in distress.

This was EVAN E. SETTLE as the boy, it was EVAN E. SETTLE as a young man, and it was EVAN E. SETTLE as we knew him in the halls of Congress. We all remember how he referred to his early hatred of the doctrines of Cassius M. Clay and how earnestly he pleaded that the last days of the old veteran be made comfortable by financial recognition of his past services at the hands of the Federal Government. His portrayal of the financial condition of the old soldier, whose convictions were opposite to his own, will ever be remembered by all who heard him. He opposed the President of the United States in his policies, but he called with fervent tongue for us to stand by that President because he was the President. EVAN E. SETTLE was intensely American, and none loved his native State more dearly than he. He was first for the nation, then for his State of Kentucky, then for his people, and last for himself. The character of the man is best illustrated by one passage in his speech favoring the appropriation for the war with Spain. He said:

I come to you in this great crisis to pledge to you Kentucky, the first-born child of the American Union, which is now ready, as she has ever been in every great emergency, to send her gallant soldiers to the field. They poured out their rich lifeblood upon the early battlefields of the Republic; they stormed the heights of Chapultepec and incarnadined the plains of Buena Vista and of Molino del Rey. In the womb of her great mother, Virginia, she helped win the battlefields of the Revolution, and there has been no crisis in our nation's history when she has not shone forth, a chief star in all this magnificent constellation of States. There stood old Kentucky then, ever eager for the fray, and there stands old Kentucky to-day.

The lawyer's record has been made up, the orator's voice has been hushed, and it only remains for us to-day to send a message to those who knew him best that he was also known and loved in the Congress of the United States.

When the bill was passed removing Southern political disabilities, EVAN E. SETTLE electrified the House with a patriotic speech, in which he said:

I thank God that I have lived to see this day. We sometimes thought that the great war between the States was an unmitigated evil, but in the providence of God it, accompanied by other agencies, has proved a great blessing. That war was not of chance or of accident. It came as the winds come and as the storms come and as all things else come—in response to the eternal purposes and behests of Him who "holds the wind in His fist and the hearts of men in the hollow of His hand."

* * * * * * *

When valor and courage and endurance shall no longer command the praise of men, when tribute shall be denied to those who endured privation without complaint and suffered all manner of sacrifices without murmur, then we might hesitate to unroll the curtain of that past and let its scenes pass in panorama before us. But Heaven forbid in this day, when one touch of nature has made us all akin, that I should fear in this presence to hold up for admiration the prowess of the gallant boys in the trenches and in the fields, wearing the blue or wearing the gray, who gave to the cause of their country their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

Mr. Speaker, the district which I have the honor to represent in the State of Indiana lies near a portion of the district represented by Mr. SETTLE in the State of Kentucky. I knew Mr. SETTLE for many years before either of us became a member of this body. I met him in the courts of Kentucky and Indiana. I knew his private life. As a friend he was true as steel. As a foe he was magnanimous and forgiving. At the bar he was ever fair and courteous, and a stanch adherent to the strictest ethics of his profession. He was a brave man; too brave a man to do an underhanded act. It was owing to his devotion to his political friends that he lost his life. During the exciting campaign in Kentucky he worked night and day, and, completely forgetting himself, he so labored in the cause of his friends that nature, unable to stand the strain, became prostrated. His death was directly caused by overwork, mental and physical. That work was not in his own behalf, but in the cause of his friends. The nation has lost an orator and a statesman while yet in his prime. His State has lost one of the most admirable of her citizens.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I had known EVAN E. SETTLE for more than twenty years before his death. Indeed, sir, our political lives were cast upon parallel lines. On the same day, in the year 1878, we were both elected to the offices of county attorney of our respective counties, and likewise we both laid down the duties and honors of that station to become members of the lower house of the Kentucky general assembly, and while these occurrences were at different dates, yet we were at one and the same time members of that body, he of one house and I of the other. We were of the same political faith and practice, and often met in party councils, and always fought in the same line when the conflict was raging. But the pleasure of serving in the same body with him was reserved for me until we were both, on the same date, elected for the first time to Congress, which was in 1896. His death, sir, therefore, was singularly sad to me because of my associations and connections with him.

He was born in the city of Frankfort, Ky., on the 1st day of December, 1848. There in the capital of his State, an historic city that nestles so serenely in the valleys upon either side the winding Kentucky River, encircled by a lofty and beautiful chain of hills, in the midst of a brave, generous, and cultured population, he received his early education and was baptized with high and hallowed inspirations.

In the calm of my unbroken reflections and undisturbed meditations upon the many admirable and noble qualities of mind and heart he possessed, I have often wondered to what extent they may have been traceable to the auspicious environments of his youthful days. But human genius has not yet given to the world the rule of correctly estimating the influences exerted by early surroundings upon the subsequent lives and characters of men; yet that their touch is too lasting to be eradicated by the evolutions of growth and is visible here and there in the career of all is an unchallenged truth.

He descended from a family eminently reputable in character, though limited in fortune. So far as I am advised, he could claim no distinguished ancestors within the reflected light of whose splendid achievements he could rise with ease to glory and fame. Without the aid of fortune, the prestige and potentiality of a great family name, by his own inherent and unfailing powers of mind and spirit, intensified and invigorated by the fortuitous circumstances mentioned, he triumphed in the struggles and conflicts of his advancing career. He was endowed by nature with more than usual intellectual ability, a zealous, noble heart, a happy, cheerful disposition, which, under the energizing effect of his literary and professional courses, developed him into the courtly gentleman, the able lawyer, the patriotic statesman, and the magnificent orator that he was.

In his young manhood he yielded to the promptings of his native fitness in the selection of his profession, and his brilliant successes and triumphs at the bar vindicated the wisdom and correctness of his choice. Before the courts he was always pleasing, learned, and forceful, but it was only when before a jury that he rose to the full majesty of his matchless eloquence and displayed the unrivaled splendors of his talents. With a sense of honor unswerved by the siren song of every tempter, he was ever mindful of the principles of fairness and observed the amenities that characterize the typical gentleman in every relation of life. He was as courteous, dignified, and honorable in the forum as he was gentle, charming, and lovable in his private life.

His official labors began in the office of county attorney of Owen County, to which he was elected in 1878, and closed at his death with a membership in the Fifty-sixth Congress. His long, faithful, and excellent record in public office has been so well stated by my colleagues [Mr. GAYLE and Mr. BERRY] that it need not now be reiterated. I shall, however, add that EVAN SETTLE, disliking no one, yet loved with unsurpassed devotion the great body of the people. He believed with a fixedness born of an intelligent and profound consideration of the question that a strong and independent citizenship was the surest, best hope and indispensable prerequisite to the perpetuity of our free institutions, and his whole official and political life was squared by this sound and wholesome doctrine. He was active and influential in every official circle to which the vicissitudes of fortune had assigned him, and it is no exaggeration to say of him that there was not one amongst the many new members in the Fifty-fifth Congress who made a more distinctive and permanent impression upon his fellow-members than he. His resplendent virtues will be enshrined in the unfading memories of his appreciative colleagues.

As a public speaker, whether upon the lecture platform, before the select and élite, or on the hustings, before the enthused and indiscriminating multitudes, he swayed one and all by the magical powers of his efforts, and they loved to linger upon his poetic strains and revel in the pleasures of his sublime sentiments.

But the surest and safest test of the genuine nobility of any man's nature is to be found perhaps in the family circle. It is there that innumerable incidents and conditions arise that can appeal to and touch the kindest emotions of the truly good and great only. To know a man as he really is he must be seen, not under the glimmering of artifice so common in the public arena, but inspected rather under the searchlight and sheen of everyday life in his family relation.

Measured by this exalted standard, our deceased colleague was an illustrious example of Christian manhood worthy of the emulation of ourselves and all who shall live after him. In his home there was an inexhaustible fountain of love whose pure streams of peace, happiness, and pleasure nourished the highest and best aspirations of the human heart. Surrounded by a true and tenderly loving wife, bright, attractive, and happy-hearted children, his home to him was the gem of the earth and the companionship of these loved ones the essence of life itself. But the charm of that blessed relation has been broken.

Death is a silent and merciless reaper that with his trenchant blade gathers in a mysterious way from every field and in every season. The young, the middle-aged, and the old; the humble, the sturdy, and the proud, one and all, succumb to the cycle's touch and pass with the swiftness of a breath that is spent. But man was created for a destiny that transcends the possibilities of human life within this sphere, and death is not annihilation. There is that in the lives of such men as our deceased colleague that gives us indisputable assurance that beyond the gaze of mortal eyes there is a realm in which the pure and just will live and move in untrammeled progression forever.

Distressing and appalling, then, to his family and friends as was and has been the sad event of his transition, we doubt not that he has been crowned with honors the world could not give and wreathed with laurels that fadeth not away.

And then, the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. LANHAM], in pursuance of the resolution heretofore adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), declared the House adjourned until 12 o'clock m. on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

DR. EDWARD W. NORTONI.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill (S. 478) to increase the pension of Dr. Edward W. Nortoni I present the affidavit of Dr. Evan Jones and J. A. Peyton and House Report No. 2640, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session. I move that the papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, to report it with amendments and to submit a report thereon. I give notice that on Wednesday next I shall ask for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4129) to detach the county of Dyer from the eastern division of the western district of Tennessee and to attach the same to the western division of the western district of said State of Tennessee, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1864) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin Wilson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 982) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to examine certain claims of persons who owned or occupied buildings on the Hot Springs Mountain Reservation, which had been condemned by the Hot Springs Commission and afterwards burned, and to fix a reasonable value thereof, and making appropriation for the payment of said claims, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2582) to provide for the establishment of the intersection of the true one hundredth meridian with Red River, to ascertain the amount of taxes collected by the State of Texas in what was formerly known as Greer County, and the expenditures made on account of said county by said State, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 44) granting honorably discharged soldiers of the late civil war privileges under the land laws of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1682) to grant a tract of land in the district of Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

A bill (H. R. 3131) granting a pension to Matilda O'Connor; and

A bill (H. R. 5088) granting an increase of pension to William G. Willoughby.

SENATOR FROM MONTANA.

Mr. CHANDLER. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I report a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM A. CLARK was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the legislature of the State of Montana.

Mr. CHANDLER. I also submit a written report, of which I ask the usual number of copies may be ordered printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed under the rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. I also submit the testimony taken by the committee. The first print I ask may be of the report without the testimony. I now ask that the usual number of printed copies may be ordered of the testimony with the report, and I also offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator will, without objection, be complied with. The Senator from New Hampshire offers a concurrent resolution, which will be read.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 700 copies of the books of testimony with the report in the Montana Senatorial election case, bound in cloth, of which 400 shall be for the use of the House, 200 for the use of the Senate, and 100 for the use of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire ask for the printing of what appear to be bound volumes in addition to the copies provided by the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; I ask that the usual number may be printed of the report without the testimony, and the usual number of the bound volumes with the testimony, and then I have offered a resolution to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, some members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, without in any way dissenting from the resolution that has been offered on this subject by the chairman, desire to submit some remarks for themselves as to the conduct of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand that the Senator desires to address the Senate now?

Mr. PETTUS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Later on?

Mr. PETTUS. No, sir; not that, either. A minority of the committee disagree to portions of this report, and they desire to submit their views in writing, to be printed also, not dissenting, however, at all from the resolution, the results of the finding of the committee.

A bill (S. 4316) for the relief of John McFarland; and

A bill (S. 4317) for the relief of W. S. Atwood.

Mr. FORAKER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4318) granting an increase of pension to Joseph C. Emerson;

A bill (S. 4319) granting an increase of pension to David H. Cope; and

A bill (S. 4320) granting a pension to Josiah Glenn.

Mr. DANIEL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 4321) for the relief of the estate of Samuel Good, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

FREE HOMES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 17) to provide free homes on the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers and reserve the public lands for that purpose; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SALARIES OF TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the bill (S. 249) fixing the salaries and compensation of the chief justices and associate justices of the supreme courts in the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, and making appropriations to pay the same, be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment authorizing the President of the United States to appoint in the Navy, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an inspector, to be attached to the office of the Secretary of the Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also submitted an amendment authorizing the President of the United States to appoint to the Naval Academy, annually, six naval cadets from among the apprentices on United States training ships, or at the training stations, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 62) granting an increase of pension to Robert Black;

An act (S. 208) granting an increase of pension to Josephine I. Offley;

An act (S. 209) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black;

An act (S. 239) granting an increase of pension to Rhoda A. Foster;

An act (S. 241) granting a pension to Patrick Layhee;

An act (S. 261) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie H. Hyndman;

An act (S. 320) granting an increase of pension to Allen Buckner;

An act (S. 346) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Arthusea Wright;

An act (S. 531) granting a pension to Henrietta Cummins;

An act (S. 645) granting an increase of pension to David Hunter;

An act (S. 677) granting an increase of pension to Jerusha W. Sturgis;

An act (S. 819) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Bourne;

An act (S. 833) granting an increase of pension to Harry Atkinson;

An act (S. 994) granting an increase of pension to Casper Miller, jr.;

An act (S. 1194) granting an increase of pension to John B. Ritzman;

An act (S. 1228) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Jordan;

An act (S. 1250) granting a pension to Hattie E. Redfield;

An act (S. 1251) granting an increase of pension to Celia A. Jeffers;

An act (S. 1255) granting an increase of pension to James M. Simer;

An act (S. 1264) granting an increase of pension to James A. Southard;

An act (S. 1268) granting a pension to Sarah R. Burrell;

An act (S. 1298) granting an increase of pension to Oscar Taylor;

An act (S. 1309) granting an increase of pension to Herman Piel;

An act (S. 1331) granting an increase of pension to Ellen C. Abbott;

An act (S. 1419) granting an increase of pension to Annie B. Goodrich;

An act (S. 1721) granting an increase of pension to Amos H. Goodnow;

An act (S. 1729) granting an increase of pension to Oliver J. Lyon;

An act (S. 1769) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frank;

An act (S. 1960) granting an increase of pension to Eli J. Marsh;

An act (S. 2167) granting an increase of pension to Franklin C. Plantz;

An act (S. 2209) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Higgins;

An act (S. 2220) granting an increase of pension to Eudora S. Kelley;

An act (S. 2351) granting an increase of pension to Joseph W. Skelton;

An act (S. 2375) granting a pension to Mary A. Russell;

An act (S. 2622) granting a pension to Maria A. Thompson;

An act (S. 2636) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Law;

An act (S. 2742) restoring to the pension roll the name of Annie A. Gibson;

An act (S. 2942) granting an increase of pension to William Padgett;

An act (S. 3017) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Edie; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 114) for relief of Garfield Hospital.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9139) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the PRESIDENT pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10097) to authorize the Atlantic and Gulf Short Line Railroad Company to build, construct, and maintain railway bridges across the Ocmulgee and Oconee rivers within the boundary lines of Irwin, Wilcox, Telfair, and Montgomery counties, in the State of Georgia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 10450) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 10840) providing compensation to United States commissioners in Chinese deportation cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

COMMISSIONS APPOINTED BY THE EXECUTIVE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. CULBERSON on the 21st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate, first, what commissions have been created or appointed by the Executive, or under his authority, since March 4, 1897, in reference to the foreign relations or the Territories of the United States or to inquire into the conduct of the late war with Spain: second, the names of the persons composing each of said commissions; third, the total compensation paid each of said commissioners; fourth, the total compensation paid each of the secretaries, clerks, and other employees of each of said commissions, and fifth, the total traveling, incidental, and other expenses of each of said commissions.

Mr. CULBERSON. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], I ask that the resolution may lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. Maintaining its place?

Mr. CULBERSON. Maintaining its place, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL AT DELAWARE BAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, to which he calls the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania:

The bill (H. R. 9566) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay, was read twice by its title.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, a similar bill has already passed the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill received from the House of Representatives may be taken up and passed now, after which I will move that the Senate bill be recalled from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PENROSE. I now move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3639) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose, as I said on Saturday, to detain the Senate by any lengthy remarks upon this question, because on two previous occasions when the same subject has been under discussion I have stated very fully my views as to the correct construction of the Constitution upon the point now in controversy. I believe that the resolution should be amended in accordance with my motion, that the word "not" should be stricken out and that Mr. Quay should be declared entitled to a seat in the Senate upon the credentials which he presents, being an appointment from the governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, the question before the Senate is one purely of constitutional construction and should be treated as such by all Senators. It is not a question of politics or of political discretion; and I have no remarks to address to Senators who expect to be actuated in voting upon the resolution by anything else than their convictions as to the correct construction of the clause in the Constitution under which Governor Stone has made the appointment of Mr. Quay.

Equally with other Senators, I have been written to by many citizens of the United States, residents of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, who have told me that ex-Senator Quay was a bad man and ought not to be seated because he is a bad man. I have also, I am bound to say, received many letters, perhaps quite as many, saying that he is a good man and should be seated because he is a good man. I may add that the same class of letters have been addressed to me in reference to the Montana Senatorial election case.

Now, Mr. President, perhaps we ought not to take offense at such letters. Freedom of communication between the people and their representatives in the House and Senate should be allowed. But when a question of this kind comes on to be decided by the Senate according to the views of Senators upon constitutional construction, every suggestion of this sort should be laid aside. If ex-Senator Quay is a bad man, doubtless the people of Pennsylvania will take care of him in the coming election and see that he is not returned to the Senate by a vote of the legislature of Pennsylvania. If, in their judgment, he is a good man, they will send him here again, and they will not be influenced by what may be said concerning him either in the Senate or outside of the State of Pennsylvania. So, now that this question is approaching a decision, I confidently ask Senators to take it up purely as a question of constitutional law.

It is appropriate for me to say further, however, that there have been suggestions floating about outside of this Chamber, sometimes in the Chamber, that some bargain had been made by the friends of ex-Senator Quay with the friends of another Senator whose right to a seat in this body has been called in question. Mr. President, I shall not waste time upon those rumors, because I have been authorized by both sides of the alleged bargain to deny that any such bargain exists or has existed. Therefore I ask Senators to dismiss any idea that their votes ought to be influenced by rumors of an alleged bargain which is a mere figment of the diseased imagination of somebody outside of this Chamber; for, necessarily, no Senator could be influenced by any notion of that kind unless he were prepared to adduce some proofs of the charges made.

Mr. President, the question whether Governor Stone had the right to appoint Mr. Quay depends upon the correct meaning of a half a dozen lines in the Constitution. Here they are:

If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Now, a fair method of debating the question that has arisen in contemplation of this clause is to have each side of the contention take the clause and make such alteration in its language as will unmistakably give to the clause the meaning for which that side contends and see what light, if any, is given. I propose to do that. First, the supporters of the contention that the governor has the right to make an appointment whenever there is a vacancy can accomplish their purpose by changing one word in the Constitution. Strike out the word "happen" and insert the word "exist."

If vacancies exist by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Or, second, by a different change of three words, the clause may be made to justify our contention. Strike out the words "If vacancies happen" and insert "In case of vacancies;" so as to make the clause read:

In case of vacancies by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It is clear that if either of those two changes were made, either striking out one word and inserting another, or striking out three words and inserting three other words, the contention of the opponents of seating Mr. Quay would be gone. I suppose that that will not be disputed by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What three words would you strike out?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will make a restatement in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut. My first proposition is that my side is right if the word "happen" is stricken out and the word "exist" is written in, and my second proposition is that we are right if the words "If vacancies happen" should be changed to the words "In case of vacancies." Those simple changes support the contention of the advocates of the governor's right, and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY], who made the majority report in this case, admits my claim. On the fourth page of the majority report, speaking of the clause in the Constitution as originally reported by the committee on detail, which says, "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," he says:

It will be noticed that under the clause, as thus reported, the power of appointment was vested in the executive in any condition of vacancy. In other words, the clause contained apt language to express the very idea upon which Mr. Quay now bases his claim to a seat in this body. If that clause had been adopted, undoubtedly the executive would have had the right to appoint as long as the vacancy existed, no matter how often the legislature, after the vacancy occurred, might have met and failed to fill it.

Then came a change, made by Mr. Madison, adopted by the Convention, and under that change the Senator from Tennessee admits that Mr. Quay should be seated. The clause as changed was:

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

The Senator from Tennessee of this change says:

It will again be seen that under Mr. Madison's amendment the vacancy could be filled by the executive no matter when it happened nor how often the legislature had failed to fill it. Under this amendment, if a vacancy happened during a session of the legislature and the legislature failed to fill it, or if it happened during a recess of the legislature, the executive could appoint until the next meeting of the legislature; and then if the legislature failed to fill the vacancy, the executive could again appoint.

Therefore the majority of the committee admit, and I trust the Senator from Connecticut, who intends to honor me by replying to my remarks this morning, will admit, that if this change of one word, or of three words, in the language of the Constitution as it stands were to be allowed as a fair method of ascertaining the meaning of the clause and securing a correct interpretation of it, Mr. Quay would be admitted at this time.

But, Mr. President, I can do even better with this clause than to change one word or three words in order to justify my contention. I can make it read so that the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Connecticut will admit that Mr. Quay ought to be seated, without changing a word in the original clause, simply by rearranging its parts. I ask the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. I would like him to tell me whether, if the clause read as I am now about to read it, without changing a single word in it, but only rearranging the sentences, he would then resist the admission of Mr. Quay under the governor's appointment. I will hand Senators copies of the rearrangement of the sentences. I should like to have the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] consider it with care before he speaks, as he intends to do, upon this question.

Here is my rearranged clause:

The executive of any State, during the recess of the legislature thereof, may make temporary appointments, if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

I ask the Senators whether there is any doubt that under the clause so arranged, as a matter of original construction, the governor would have the right to appoint whenever a vacancy existed, and could make as many appointments as there were occasions on which vacancies existed.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Does not the Senator think that the language as it stands in the Constitution, in accordance with the natural import of the words, bears out the construction which he places upon it? In this connection, I beg leave to call his attention to the opinion of Mr. Taney, as Attorney-General of the United States, in construing similar language which is applied to Executive appointments. He says, giving it the construction the Senator is now advocating, as to the Constitution that—

> This appears to be the common sense and the natural import of the words used. They mean the same thing as if the Constitution had said "if there happen to be any vacancies during the recess."

Mr. LINDSAY. That is a vacancy in office.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course, in office.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I think myself that the fair meaning of the clause as it stands, with the very words of the clause in the order of arrangement in which they now stand in the Constitution, supports the contention of the Senator from Virginia and my contention. What I am endeavoring to do is to show by how few words our contention might be made absolutely certain and contrast them with the many words it would take to make absolutely certain the contention of Senators on the other side.

In order to alter the clause in the Constitution so as to make it absolutely certain that it means what Senators on the other side say it does, I find it necessary to put thirty-six words into the clause—to double the number of words. I will give the Senator from Connecticut the clause thus changed, so as to make us surrender our contention to the other side.

> If vacancies shall first come into existence by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments before the legislature again meets, until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies. But if vacancies exist after the legislature has had an opportunity to fill them and has failed to do so, the governor shall not make temporary appointments.

Mr. President, it seems to me that here is fair ground for contending that the clause in the Constitution as it stands means what we say it means, because it is necessary to change so few words to make our construction absolutely certain and beyond controversy, while in order to make it absolutely certain that it means what Senators upon the other side claim, it is necessary to make changes involving the addition of thirty-six words.

Passing from these suggestions, I come now to assert that as a matter of original construction the mere use of the word "happen" instead of "exist" does not give the important meaning for which the Senator from Tennessee argues, but that the natural and legitimate construction of the clause in the Constitution, as a matter of original construction, tested by fair rules, gives the broad and beneficent power claimed for it to the governor of a State. There has been much argument against us based upon the change of the language in this clause made by the Convention which adopted the Constitution. The original draft of the clause in the Convention was:

> Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.

If this clause had remained, the Senator from Tennessee and the majority report admit that the governor could appoint in the present case. Later the clause was changed to read as follows:

> Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancy shall happen or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

It is further admitted by the majority report that if the clause had remained in this last form the governor could appoint in this case, but when the committee on style made their final report it is claimed that a radical change of meaning was provided for. That clause, as slightly amended and placed as it now reads in the Constitution, was:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Mr. President, I insist that there is no foundation whatever for the contention that the change of language created any change of meaning. The presumption is all the other way. When we find language in the report of the committee on detail which justifies the exercise of the power of appointment by the governor in the present case, and when we find in the modifications of the report of the committee on detail such language adopted by the Convention in the first instance that the governor would have the right to appoint in the present case, the presumption is very great that the committee on style did not intend to make a radical change from the original construction twice embodied in apt language.

It was the duty of the committee on style to make no change of meaning. If they made a change it certainly was the duty of the committee to call the attention of the Convention to the change which they had made. Notwithstanding the many references that have been made to the debates upon this subject in the Constitutional Convention, there has not been disclosed a single word to indicate that the committee on style intended to radically change the meaning of the clause as it had been reported by the committee on detail, and once adopted by the Convention. I ask the Senators who are to reply to me whether they can point out anything in the discussions in the Constitutional Convention which warrants them in their claim that the committee on style intended to change the meaning of the clause. I ask them to submit to the Senate at this time such statements and arguments, if any were made.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. With the consent of the Senator, I will make a suggestion. In view of the fact that the Convention merely formulated the Constitution and the States adopted it, is it very material how, through what steps, or by what process of reasoning the Convention reached its ultimate conclusion when submitting that paper to the various States that adopted it; and is it not a question as to what the States intended rather than what the various members of the Convention may have thought the States would intend?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kentucky is an abler lawyer than I am. He knows better than I do what are the proper rules of construction of a statute or of a clause in the Constitution. As I understand the proper rule of construction, the question is what does the language mean in its natural import, and such natural import can not be destroyed by quoting from debates in the Convention which framed the Constitution any more than it can be destroyed by quoting from debates in the State conventions which adopted the Constitution. Those debates and contemporaneous and later construction throw light upon the subject. But after all, as every lawyer knows, an individual when he makes a contract, a legislature when it makes a law, a convention when it makes a constitution must not only mean to do a thing, but it must do it in apt language; otherwise the result which is intended to be accomplished is not accomplished. The Senator from Kentucky does not differ with me on that point.

What I say is that the meaning of the clause in the Constitution when it was finally adopted, after the report made by the committee on style, was exactly the same as it was when it was reported from the committee on detail and when it was first voted upon by the Convention and submitted to the committee on style. Exactly what it was in the beginning it was in the end; and as it was in the beginning, by the admission of the majority report, the governor's appointee in this case is entitled to his seat.

Mr. President, I repeat that the natural meaning of the clause is that "if vacancies happen to exist" or that "if vacancies exist," they shall be filled by the governor at any time, provided the legislature is not then in session to fill them. The best statement I can make of my idea is simply the transposing of the sentences, as I have done, without changing one word of the thirty-six words of which the clause consists. Under this transposition the governor's power will be conceded. Can it be, Mr. President, that so important a restriction upon the power of the executive as is contended for by Senators upon the other side of this question was made by simply a different arrangement of the very same thirty-six words?

Take again the case I have suggested of a simple change in the language without transposition. Instead of saying, "If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise," say, "In case of vacancies by resignation or otherwise." There is no doubt what that would mean. It is conceded on the other side. Then the governor appoints. That would cover all possible cases of vacancies. Yet Senators say that the mere use of the word "happen" excludes the idea that a vacancy can be filled by the governor if it continues to exist after a legislature has had an opportunity to fill a vacancy and has not filled it. It is narrow reasoning and illiberal construction.

There is a singular inconsistency, Mr. President, manifested by Senators on the other side of this question in connection with a certain clause in the Pennsylvania constitution which has been quoted, and anathemas have been hurled at the head of the governor of Pennsylvania because, in pursuance of that clause, he does not call together again the legislature which was unable to elect a Senator, so that it may perchance fill this vacancy, instead of sending Mr. Quay here with the governor's appointment. The clause reads:

> In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth in a recess between sessions, the governor shall convene the two houses, by proclamation on notice not exceeding sixty days, to fill the same.

Mr. President, nobody on the other side of this question seems to doubt that this clause means that the governor is bound to call a meeting of the legislature where the vacancy happened while the legislature was in session. Mark the language:

> In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth in a recess.

This vacancy did not happen in a recess. It happened while the legislature was in session; and according to the narrow construction which Senators place upon the Constitution of the United States, the governor was under no obligation whatever to call a meeting of the legislature, because the vacancy happened while the legislature was in session and not in recess. The vacancy did happen while the legislature was in session. It was unable to fill the vacancy, and it adjourned without filling the vacancy. Are the Senators right both in their construction of the United States Constitution and their construction of the Pennsylvania constitution?

Mr. President, having stated what seems to me to be the obvious meaning of this clause in the Constitution, as it stands, as a matter of original construction, I wish to enforce that idea, as I have done before, by a reference to certain well-known rules for the construction of statutes and constitutions. Courts get aid in doubtful cases from certain considerations; first, by looking for the purposes of the act or clause of the Constitution and what was intended to be accomplished; secondly, by inquiring whether it is a beneficial or a penal statute that has been enacted, and thirdly, by asking, What are the precedents?

Briefly, I repeat that in this case the object of the clause in the Constitution was unquestionably for the purpose of keeping the Senate at all times filled, of having no vacancies here. That being the purpose, such a construction of the clause in the Constitution should be adopted, if it fairly can be adopted, as will subserve that purpose. No one denies this was the object and purpose of the act. No one denies that it was deemed to be an important result to be accomplished, and a liberal construction of the Constitution fulfills that purpose in the present case by allowing the governor to exercise the right of appointment.

Moreover, Mr. President, this was not a penal statute; it was a beneficial statute. Senators on the other side may search the law books, but they can not produce a single authority to break the force of the argument that this was a beneficial statute, and therefore to be construed liberally, and not a penal statute, to be construed strictly. Such Senators violate all precedent and all reason when they undertake to construe this statute as a penal statute would be construed; when they stick in the bark of the clause instead of going to the spirit of the clause and helping to accomplish the beneficial purpose intended by the framers of the Constitution.

Such being, in my judgment, the true original construction of the Constitution, that it is a statute intended to keep the Senate full, a beneficial statute instead of penal statute, I come to the question of the precedents. It is not my purpose to review these at length. I wish to allude to an early precedent against the other side—in a case where the legislature of a State had an opportunity to fill a vacancy and failed to do it. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], on February 24, 1898, volume 31, part 3, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 229, gives the letter of Samuel Smith, addressed to the President of the Senate, which is as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1809.

SIR: The legislature of Maryland having at their last session declined to appoint a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States from and after the 3d day of March of the present year, and the executive of the State having conferred on me the honor of an appointment, which, in conformity to the Constitution, was limited in its language to the next meeting of the legislature of Maryland, I have to state to you, for the information of the Senate, that this meeting will take place on the 5th day of June, as by the governor's proclamation will appear; and I have therefore to request that you will be pleased to lay this case before the honorable the Senate for their determination as to the question whether an appointment under the executive of Maryland to represent that State in the Senate of the United States will or will not cease on the first day of the meeting of the legislature of Maryland.

SAMUEL SMITH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Smith asked admission to the Senate, and appears to have been admitted. So here was a case where there was a liberal construction of the Constitution in accordance with its obvious meaning. The Senator from Wisconsin perhaps has a reference to the Walker case, which was earlier than the case of Kensey Johns.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; that is there.

Mr. CHANDLER. In that case, I think, the same construction of the Constitution was adopted. So a liberal construction was adopted both shortly before and shortly after the Kensey Johns case. Why it was that a narrow and illiberal construction was adopted in that case I can not say, but I have an impression, Mr. President, that during the first third of the century under the Constitution there was a disposition in the Senate to concentrate power rather than to broaden it out.

It occurs to me that possibly this narrow construction of the Constitution, which first found expression in the Kensey Johns case—when there were only 30 members of the body, and there was probably a greater disposition to concentrate power in a few hands than there is now, and newcomers in the Senate may not have been welcome—grew out of a disposition to keep Senators out rather than to enlarge their numbers. Under the influence of that sentiment the Kensey Johns case was decided, and following it the narrow, illiberal, and, as I conceive it, unjustifiable construction of the Constitution took shape and form and became embodied in some of the precedents of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, the various motions which were put forward to justify this narrow construction of the Constitution it has been very difficult to retain. It has been found impossible to contend, as time has progressed, for all the ideas upon which this narrow construction of the Constitution was based. I can show this by alluding briefly to the arguments which have been made to sustain such a construction.

The first idea was that the Constitution did not allow a governor to make an appointment to fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a term. That was argued with great force and persistency. The argument was that there could be no vacancy in anything which had never been filled. It was asked, "How can you say anything is vacant when it never has been occupied?" That was one of the absurd refinements of those early days; and so they said at first that while a casual vacancy coming after a six years' term had been once filled by election could be filled by the governor, yet if a vacancy was found to be in existence on the 4th of March, at the beginning of the term, the governor could not make an appointment to fill it.

Time went on, and that narrow construction of the Constitution was exploded, and we have had a dozen cases which could be recited, if it were necessary, which show that vacancies can be filled by the governor of a State where the vacancy took place on the 4th of March, at the beginning of a term. That old idea is gone. Senators on the other side do not now contend for it.

There was another idea for a long time contended for with equal zeal and energy—that the governor could not appoint in anticipation of a vacancy. Although the governor might know that there was to be a vacancy on the 4th of March or at any other time by the resignation of a Senator or otherwise, he could not make an appointment, he could not sign the commission, he could not send his Senator to the Capitol until after the vacancy had actually taken place. And, Mr. President, the influence of this foolish—I will call it foolish and absurd—notion remained until the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] now absent came to the Senate with an appointment made by the governor of that State in anticipation of a vacancy. The question went before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made a report, which was adopted by the Senate, in which it was decided that the governor could make an appointment in anticipation of a vacancy. So this second notion of the earlier years disappeared.

The other notion which has led to a restriction upon the clause of the Constitution, and which is the cause of the present controversy, was that the governor could not appoint where the legislature had a chance to elect and did not succeed in electing. There is no foundation whatever for that idea anywhere in the language of the Constitution. It was an absurd notion, invented by those who sought for a narrow construction of the Constitution. It prevailed for a time, starting with the Kensey Johns case, and coming down to 1879; but then the new era of construction of this clause in the Constitution begun.

In 1879, in the New Hampshire case, the case of Charles H. Bell, it was held that the governor had the right to make an appointment where there was doubt as to whether the legislature had an opportunity to fill the vacancy, where there was doubt whether the legislature had been at fault for not filling the vacancy. The decision was made in favor of the governor's right to appoint. And so one after another these various limitations upon the meaning of this clause in the Constitution have disappeared, and we now come to the question whether the last limitation which anyone has conceived of shall remain, or whether we shall revert to the original construction put upon this clause by the founders of the Constitution themselves in the earliest beginning.

Mr. President, I will not undertake to discuss over again the points that were made in the two recent cases, the Mantle case and the Corbett case. We are asked to consider the question as no longer an open one. The decision in the Mantle case was made by a small vote, about 3 majority against his admission, but the decision in the Corbett case was made by a large majority, 31; and therefore we are asked to treat the question as no longer open. There is for me a good answer to that proposition. It is that I do know that Senators were not governed in their votes in those two cases by a consideration of what was the true construction of the Constitution.

I shall call no names, but I know Senators who voted against Mr. Mantle because he was what they called a "Silver Senator;" and I know that in the Corbett case there was a feeling in the Senate somewhat like that of retaliation, and that Senators voted against Mr. Corbett because he was what they called a "Gold Senator." Under those circumstances I made up my mind at the time when the Corbett vote was taken that I should not consider the decision as one that bound me thereafter. Other Senators take the same view. We believe that the true doctrine is that which we now advocate; and we intend to persist in advocating it as long as there is any reasonable hope that it may be adopted as the true doctrine.

Mr. President, very little things sometimes effect important results. I feel very certain that if two Senators who voted against Mr. Mantle because he was a silver Senator, as they called him, had voted for his admission, and he had been admitted, and the governors' appointees from Washington and Wyoming had been admitted, Mr. Corbett, beyond all question, would also have been admitted, and the sound doctrine as to the construction of this clause in the Constitution would have been adopted by the Senate of the United States. Be that as it may, Mr. President, I do not consider that any Senator is bound by the decision in the Corbett case, and I especially very much regret that the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON], succeeding Mr. Corbett in this Chamber, should have found it expedient to vote against seating Mr. Quay, when he holds that the true construction of the Constitution would admit him to a seat under the governor's appointment.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMON. The reason I shall vote against the seating of Mr. Quay is because the Senate by an unbroken line of decisions during the past seventy-five years has decided against the right claimed under the appointment made by the governor of Pennsylvania. If this was an original question, I should follow the reasoning of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire and should vote that the governor had a right to make an appointment in such a case, but since the Senate has, during a period covering so many years, decided to the contrary, I feel it my duty now to vote the other way—that is, to vote that the governor had no right to make the appointment in this case.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I only said that I regretted the Senator voted that way. My mind is to-day filled with recollections of the great struggle we made to seat Mr. Corbett, the claimant from Oregon on the governor's appointment, and I know the present Senator from Oregon sympathized very ardently with us in that effort. While I think the Senator is acting in accordance with his right and his convictions of duty, I very much regret that, believing the true construction of the Constitution is what we now contend for, he feels himself bound by the precedents to vote the other way.

Mr. President, I wish to say further that no just claim can be made here that the appointee of a governor is not entitled to as much respect as a Senator elected by the legislature. The power of the governor to appoint is of course conditional, but a governor is not the inferior of the legislature when a vacancy exists in the Senate. The governor stands on a perfect equality so far as the Constitution is concerned. The governor is elected by the people; he represents the people of the State just as much as the legislature represents them; and to belittle the governor's right of appointment in this case because the primary right is given the legislature seems to me wholly unjust. The governor, when he is named by the Constitution as having the power to fill a vacancy, is entitled to the same respect from this body as a legislature is. The governor is just as near the people, as I have said, as the legislature is, and Congress has no right to punish a State as a State is punished when a vacancy is continued in this body upon the claim that the appointee of the governor comes here with a sanction which is inferior to that with which a Senator comes who is elected by the legislature.

All these refinements about the original meaning of the Constitution have been based upon very narrow premises. The refinements about the meaning of the word "happen;" dictionary definitions of the meaning of the word "happen," and, worse than all, attempts to demonstrate, as so many hours of discussion have been used in attempting to demonstrate, to this body that the word "otherwise" means "likewise," are the most absurd arguments that I ever knew presented from any respectable source.

To illustrate what I mean I can not do better than refer to the quotations in the very able and eloquent speech of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], made on the 14th day of April. The Senator quoted very liberally from what he called the great lawyers of the Senate. I have made a list of the distinguished names which he recited. Nearly all of them were Senators—Senators Kernan, Bailey, Carpenter, Hill of Georgia, Seward, David Davis, Attorney-General Garland, Stephen A. Douglas, Lewis Cass, Mr. Underwood, James A. Bayard, Mason of Virginia, Butler of South Carolina, Jefferson Davis, George E. Badger, Senators Beck, Groome, VEST, Vance, Saulsbury, and there was Representative J. Randolph Tucker. The Senator filled his speech with quotations from these distinguished authorities, and wholly omitted to convey the information to the Senate that nearly every one of them had been overruled by the decisions of the Senate in the very cases in which they made their arguments!

There are many points which have been settled by this Senate which can be again discussed at great length hour after hour and day after day if Senators are willing to read the arguments of the defeated party. That is exactly what the Senator from Michigan did. He read over and over again the arguments of these great lawyers, whom he cited to show that a governor could not appoint a Senator in a case like the present one; and it appears that all of them said that a vacancy could never happen in a Senatorial term which had not once been filled.

I do not suppose the Senator from Michigan intended to deceive anyone, but he certainly should have called attention to the fact that he was reading overruled opinions. Senators will remember what a great lawyer the Senator from Michigan has discovered that Senator George E. Badger, of North Carolina, was. Everyone familiar with the history of this country knew that Senator George E. Badger was a great lawyer, perhaps the greatest lawyer of his State. Few Senators, I think, knew, until the Senator from Michigan said so, that he was "the greatest lawyer on earth in his day." But claiming him to be such, the Senator from Michigan said he will, "I am sure, be heard by the Senate." Now, what did Senator Badger say in the remarks which the Senator quoted?

> We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—but it can not be applied to the expiration of a term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion therefore is that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which the Senator was elected; in other words, at the termination of his term in the Senate.

The whole point of the cited opinion of this, "the greatest lawyer on earth," as the Senator from Michigan called him, was that under no circumstances could a governor make an appointment to fill a vacancy happening in the Senate in a six years' term which had never been filled, and yet the Senator from Michigan knew that there had been at least eleven cases where appointments made by the governor under such circumstances had been recognized by the Senate. So all through this erudite speech of the Senator from Michigan are quotations every one of which has been overruled by the deliberate judgment of the Senate. The Senator goes on and repeats the speeches of nearly all the minority Senators in the Bell case, as if they were now an authority to which we ought to listen, when their arguments were distinctively negatived by the vote of the Senate.

As the Senator from time to time read his quotations, he eulogized the authors. He spoke of Senator Hill, of Georgia, as a great lawyer. He spoke of Mr. Seward, of New York. Senator Beck, of Kentucky, he praised. He also paid proper compliment to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], whom he says, very rightly, illumines and adorns every subject he touches. He quotes from the Senator from Missouri. Yet the doctrine which the Senator from Missouri advocated in the remarks which were quoted has been distinctly overruled by the Senate. He had said:

> My contention here is that the original, primary power to start a full term in the Senate is with the legislature, and that the governor can only appoint as to a broken term. That is my contention.

That is not the law of the Senate to-day, because over and over again appointments by the governor made to take effect at the beginning of the term have been recognized by the Senate.

Mr. J. Randolph Tucker is no mean authority, and the Senator from Michigan read with great interest what he said, as follows:

> The better opinion would seem to be that where the term has never been filled it is a vacancy in the office by nonexercise of the elective function by the legislature, which function the executive is not competent to perform.

That antiquated and absurd doctrine which fills up one-half of the speech of the Senator from Michigan has been wholly exploded and is not sound constitutional law in the Senate to-day.

Mr. President, I am willing to deal frankly with the Senators on the other side of this question. I am willing to admit that in this case the Senate takes one more step forward. There never has been a case where the Senate has seated the appointee of a governor where the vacancy has come into existence while the legislature was in session and the legislature failed to fill that vacancy.

All we contend for is that the illiberal doctrine of the earlier years of the century was broken down in 1879, and that the decision made in the case of Mr. Bell, by which he and other appointees under similar circumstances were admitted to this Chamber, was made by reason of the adoption of a liberal construction of the Constitution, conforming, according to the best of reasoning, to the true construction which should be placed upon the clause in the Constitution about which the contention is now made.

Mr. President, we say the Senate ought to face forward and not backward upon this question. We say that the liberal construction of the Constitution which was adopted in 1879 should be extended until such a construction is given to the Constitution as should be given to a beneficial statute made to accomplish a wise and important purpose—that of keeping seats in the Senate constantly full, made for the purpose of preventing legislation in this body with vacant seats in the Chamber when the executive of the State is ready to send here competent appointees to fill those vacancies. I am conscious that I have feebly stated my views and the reasons which actuate me in continuing the contention in behalf of the liberal construction of this clause of the Constitution. I do not propose to cease from this contention until the true construction becomes, as I believe it will eventually become, the accepted doctrine in the American Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, it seems to me that one question lies in the forefront of this discussion, one which has not been sufficiently dwelt upon by those who think that under the provisions of the Constitution Mr. Quay is not entitled to a seat, and one about which, until the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire this morning, there has been a great deal of silence on the part of those who think that Mr. Quay is entitled to a seat under the provisions of the Constitution.

That question is whether anything can ever be considered settled in the Senate of the United States. Or, to put it differently, Is the Senate, now in the hundred and twelfth year of its existence, to observe the uniform precedents and the unbroken decisions of the Senate, or is it to disregard those precedents and overrule those decisions upon the ground of personal or political friendship?

I will state once more before I proceed further what every Senator has to refer to in discussing this question, the provision of the Constitution which must, or at least should, control the case. I have no doubt that the Senate is wearied by hearing it repeated. Article I, section 3, reads as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Then the Constitution proceeds to provide for the classification of Senators, and goes on:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

We also have a statute on this subject, which I wish to read. Section 14, chapter 1, of Title II of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides:

> The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

I do not cite at length section 15, which provides the method of election.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania comes here with an appointment by the governor, a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, and claims a seat. I wish to put in from the report of the committee just the circumstances under which he claims his seat:

> Prior to March 3, 1899, Mr. Quay was a Senator in Congress from the State of Pennsylvania. His term of office, to which he had been elected by the legislature of Pennsylvania, expired by efflux of time on the 3d day of March, 1899. The legislature of Pennsylvania convened in regular session on the first Tuesday in January, 1899. On Tuesday, January 17, 1899, it began balloting for the purpose of selecting some one to succeed Mr. Quay and fill the vacancy which would occur on the 3d day of March, 1899. Daily ballots were taken in obedience to the provisions of the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, and of the Pennsylvania statute of January 11, 1867, from that date until April 19, 1899. The legislature adjourned April 20 without effecting an election. Thereafter, on April 21, 1899, the governor of Pennsylvania appointed Mr. Quay to represent the State of Pennsylvania in this body until the next meeting of the legislature.

I wish to put here, right in juxtaposition with the facts under which the seating of Mr. Quay is claimed, the facts in relation to the Corbett case. I read from the report in the Corbett case:

> The term of Hon. John H. Mitchell, Senator from Oregon, ended March 3, 1897. The nineteenth biennial session of the legislature of Oregon, under the constitution and laws of that State, was to convene at the capital on the 11th of January, 1897. On that day the senate met and effected a permanent organization. The house met on the same day, effected a temporary organization, and at a later day effected a permanent organization. There was no recognition of the house by the executive branch of the government or by the coordinate branch of the legislature, the senate.
> The members of the senate and house dispersed, and returned to their homes without having transacted any business of a legislative character. It thus appears that the legislature of Oregon deliberately refused to perform any of the functions with which they were charged, one of the most important being the election of a Senator to succeed John H. Mitchell.
> We are of the opinion that a series of decisions by this body on the point involved in this case forms the rule of stare decisis.

Here are those two cases, and every point, fact, circumstance, or principle upon which Mr. Quay claims his right to be seated here was to be found in the Corbett case. In other words, Mr. Corbett had a stronger case for admission as a Senator than Mr. Quay has. The legislature in Oregon had not been in actual session; that is to say, whatever point may have been made about the technical organization of the two houses, they had never recognized each other; the senate had never recognized the house, and the governor had never recognized the house.

So no legislature had, in fact, in the Corbett case, attempted to fill the vacancy. In Pennsylvania a legislature had been in session and attempted to fill the vacancy. In the Oregon case the vacancy did not occur—I will not here in this part of the discussion use the word "happen," about which there is such contention—until after the adjournment of the legislature. In the Pennsylvania case the vacancy occurred while the legislature was in session, and the legislature proceeded for forty-seven days to endeavor to fill that vacancy or to elect a Senator to fill that term. So the case is very much stronger against Mr. Quay.

The Constitution says, if vacancies happen during the recess of the legislature the governor may make temporary appointments. The vacancy in the Corbett case did occur during the recess of the legislature. It did not occur during the recess of the legislature in the Quay case. In the Oregon case it could fairly be contended that there had been no legislature which could fill the vacancy before the appointment of the governor was made. No such claim can be made in the Pennsylvania case. There was a legislature which could fill the vacancy, which attempted to fill the vacancy, both in anticipation of it and after it occurred.

Now, what did the Senate do in the Corbett case? It heard at great length every argument which has been adduced by the Senator from New Hampshire and others. No case was ever more thoroughly argued in the Senate than that case, and the Senate by a vote of 50 to 19 decided that Mr. Corbett was not entitled to his seat. That is only two years ago. And here comes Mr. Quay, who was paired to vote against the right of Mr. Corbett to a seat in this body, and whose vote counted, therefore, against seating him in this body, and presenting a weaker case than the Corbett case, asks to be seated in this body, and the Senator from New Hampshire insists that he ought to be.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for an inquiry.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is whether he believes all those Senators voted in accordance with their convictions as to the meaning of the constitutional provision?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I was coming to that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not believe they did.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If Senators in this body vote to seat Mr. Quay, I shall not be heard outside of this body to say that I believe they voted upon other considerations than constitutional considerations. I am sorry that any Senator should, in the body or out of it, make the charge that Senators representing States—our equals, our peers—should deliberately, for political or personal considerations, refuse to vote in accordance with their ideas of the Constitution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPOONER in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to get through answering the first question the Senator asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not believe that 16 Senators in this body voted to reject Mr. Corbett because he was a gold-standard Republican. The charge is one which reflects greater dishonor upon the Senate of the United States than any charge that has ever been made against it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator why he is sorry to hear any Senator make that statement if that Senator believes it? Does he think it is a fact which should be kept secret if it is true, or that if a Senator so believes there is any obligation upon him to keep it secret?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from New Hampshire, if he believes the statement which he has made, makes a charge against 16 Senators, his equals and peers, which absolutely dishonors and disgraces them and dishonors and disgraces the Senate of the United States as well. It is the more cruel because it is general and not specific. It impeaches the integrity of the whole Senate. Mr. President, I do not believe it. I would not assert it without the most positive evidence to substantiate the charge. I do not believe it in the Mantle case. There was, perhaps, more ground for saying that the Mantle case was not decided according to the opinion of Senators of the constitutional question involved than in the Corbett case, because the votes constituting the majority were fewer. There were three, I believe, at one time and five at another, two votes being taken.

Now, if there was three majority for Mr. Mantle, two votes changed would have made a majority against him. It is possible, not probable—I hardly desire to admit that it is possible—that two Senators might so far forget their duty, might be so lost to their constitutional obligation, which is just as great without an oath as with it, but to their oath, to the sanctity and sanction of their oath, as to vote differently from what they thought the Constitution of the United States required because

Mr. Mantle was a Silver Republican. Speaking of chances, that is possible. Speaking of chances with reference to Mr. Corbett's rejection, it is impossible.

No enemy of the Senate; no newspaper that likes to cast aspersions upon the Senate; no evil-minded outsider who wishes to detract from the reputation, the dignity, the honor, and the greatness of the Senate can, as it seems to me, say that the votes of 16 Senators on this floor were given against Mr. Corbett, not on constitutional grounds, but because he was a gold-standard man. I repeat, I am sorry that the charge has been made. It will give occasion outside of the Senate for criticisms and aspersions which I think the Senate does not deserve.

Mr. President, here are the two cases. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] did not think that the Mantle case has been decided upon improper motives, for he put his report against the seating of Mr. Corbett upon the ground that the matter was settled in the Mantle case and ought to stay settled. I wish to read what he said about it:

> I prefer to put my concurrence in the conclusion of the majority of the committee squarely and entirely on the ground that the question of law involved in this case was settled in the Mantle case, and ought to remain settled forever.

Further on he says:

> The courts of England for centuries and the United States for one century declared it far better that the law should be settled and known than that it should be decided with technical accuracy. Those who have studied the judicial legislation enacted during the last forty years, the overthrow of principles long deemed settled, will appreciate the wisdom of the maxim, stare decisis.
> I think the question in this case was settled in the Mantle case and should remain settled.

So the Senator from Alabama could not have shared the opinion of Senators who say here that the Mantle case was decided by the votes of Senators who disregarded what they thought to be the constitutional requirements of a Senator coming here and asking a seat under a governor's appointment.

But, Mr. President, it is not the Corbett case alone and the Mantle case and the two companion cases of Beckwith and Allen that settled this case. There never has been a person claiming under a governor's appointment where the vacancy did not happen during the recess of the legislature admitted to a seat in the Senate. It was never claimed until it was claimed in the case of Mr. Allen, from Washington, in 1893, and he was not seated. It was not seriously claimed in that case; that is to say, the case never reached the point of discussion and serious claim in the Senate.

Now, for the first time since the organization of the Senate, comes a person claiming under a governor's appointment made to supply a vacancy which did not occur during the recess of the legislature. If anything should be considered settled, it seems to me that ought to be considered settled.

I will go a little further, Mr. President. Never has a man been seated in the Senate upon a governor's appointment where the legislature had been in session and attempted to fill the vacancy and failed. I want to emphasize that for the benefit of the Senator from New Hampshire, who says opinions have been overruled. That thing has never been done in the Senate of the United States.

But to go still further. Since 1825 no person claiming under a governor's appointment has been seated in the Senate of the United States where a legislature which could have filled the vacancy, either in anticipation or after it occurred, had been in session.

So instead of taking one step forward in this case, as the Senator suggests we should, we must take three steps backward. We must step back so that what never has been claimed until this case seriously, and what has never been acknowledged, shall now be accepted—that is, that a Senator can be appointed by the governor although the vacancy did not happen or occur during the recess.

We must also take one other step backward, and that is that a Senator may be seated although a legislature which could fill the vacancy has been in session and tried to fill it and failed to fill it.

We must take still one further step backward, and say what has not been said since 1825, when that question was considered settled in the Senate of the United States, that a person may come here claiming an appointment under a governor where a legislature could have filled the vacancy, although it did not attempt to do it.

Now, Mr. President, it is pertinent to ask again whether anything is ever to be considered settled and to remain settled in the United States Senate. The Senator talked about the opinion cited in the argument of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] having been overruled by the Senate. Every contention made by the Senator here to-day has been overruled by the Senate over and over again.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, he is mistaken about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I frankly admitted that no attempt had been made before to seat a Senator under these conditions. Now, the Senator says that every position I have taken has been overruled over and over again in the United States Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think so.

Mr. CHANDLER. He is mistaken. It never has been overruled at all, because he himself says, and it is part of his argument, that no attempt has ever been made to seat a Senator under precisely these circumstances.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It was overruled in the Allen case, for that was a case on all fours, and it was not considered then worthy of serious consideration, I will admit. The question whether a Senator can be appointed by a governor where a legislature has been in session and attempted to elect has been overruled many times and was acted upon by the universal concurrence of public sentiment and legal sentiment in the country for over fifty years. The question whether a Senator can claim under a governor's appointment, where a legislature had been in session which might have elected, but failed to elect or to attempt to elect, has been overruled repeatedly, and never, so far as I know, except in two or three cases where the question was not made or contested, has such a claim been allowed.

The very first case which was reported in the books—I understand there is an earlier case, called the Walker case, that does not appear in Taft's Election Cases—the very earliest case where there is anything in the Journals of Congress showing that there was any question made about it was the case of Kensey Johns, that was put by the Senate upon the ground—

> That a session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns, he was not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

I will not take the time of the Senate to refer at length to the sound argument so often used in these discussions that a Senate which sat only five years after it was first organized and had in it five or six or seven men who were members of the Constitutional Convention ought to have known as well as we what the Convention meant, and ought to have known as well as we whether there was such an obligation to keep the Senate always full as requires us to disregard the unambiguous, plain meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. Ellsworth was on the committee which made that report and reported that resolution, and whatever the Senator may say about Mr. Badger being the greatest lawyer on earth, I refer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as my authority for saying that Mr. Ellsworth was the greatest lawyer anywhere on the face of the earth, because he said that within a few days in the Senate. So Mr. Ellsworth, than whom no man was more powerful in the Constitutional Convention, within five years after the organization of the Senate under the Constitution—I believe he made the report—declared:

> That Kensey Johns is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

A new doctrine, the Senator from New Hampshire says. If we are going to take steps backward, let us take them back to the beginning, and take the interpretation put upon the Constitution by the men who framed it, and not by the new lights and under the new rules of interpretation, which seem to be that if you can read a change into the Constitution in three words to support your view of it it is perfectly proper to do it; because it takes more words to be read as a change into the Constitution to support what the Senator from New Hampshire seems to think is the other view of it.

Mr. President, I stand by the Constitution as it is written. I do not want to read words into the Constitution or to read them out of the Constitution; and it is only found necessary to do that by those who insist on the seating of Mr. Quay. It is not necessary for me, who think that he is not entitled to a seat here, to read any words into the Constitution or any words out of it. It does not require twenty-five words read into the Constitution to support my contention. The words there are the words upon which I rely, not the words which are not there.

It seems, Mr. President, as if it was unnecessary to read authorities as to the necessity of having the decisions of the Senate observed and respected that they should stand. To seat Mr. Quay overrules every case in the Senate which has been decided from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time, unless it be two or three minor cases along in the years from 1805 to 1809, and in one of those it does not appear from anything that was said that the question was raised or considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. What case is that?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is the Smith case, to which the Senator from New Hampshire alluded. Now, let us take the letter of Mr. Smith. Mr. Smith, of Maryland, had been a Senator from the State of Maryland, and his term expired the 3d of March, 1809, I believe. The governor gave him an appointment. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], when he discussed this case, says that there is a fact which is not stated in Taft's Election Cases. Here is a statement of the case by Senator Butler, quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin. Where else it is to be found I am not advised:

His office expired by constitutional limitation on March 3, 1869. It seems that the legislature of his State had been in session before that date, and that the legislature had forborne, for some cause or other—I do not know what—to fill the term, and did not in fact fill the term as one to commence from the 4th of March, 1869.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the resolution which is now under discussion. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, in the letter which Mr. Smith addressed to the Senate asking it to be determined how long he could hold his seat under the governor's appointment it does not appear whether a legislature had been in session which could fill the vacancy or not. Manifestly, there had been none in session after the vacancy occurred. Apparently, also, there had been a legislature in session in June, nearly a year before. It may be claimed that that legislature ought to have anticipated the vacancy and to have filled it; but that question does not seem to have been brought specially to the attention of the Senate. This is the letter addressed to the Vice-President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1809.

SIR: The legislature of Maryland, having at their last session declined to appoint a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States from and after the 3d day of March of the present year, and the executive of the State having conferred on me the honor of an appointment, which, in conformity to the Constitution, was limited in its language to the next meeting of the legislature of Maryland, I have to state to you, for the information of the Senate, that this meeting will take place on the 5th day of June, as by the governor's proclamation will appear, and I have therefore to request that you will be pleased to lay this case before the honorable the Senate for their determination as to the question whether an appointment under the executive of Maryland to represent that State in the Senate of the United States will or will not cease on the first day of the meeting of the legislature of Maryland.

SAMUEL SMITH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The only question which Mr. Smith asked the Senate to determine was when his right to a seat under the executive appointment would end, and it is idle to contend that the Senate decided anything other than the question submitted to it.

But it is not very important to determine whether the attention of Congress was called to the fact that the legislature which sat nearly a year before the expiration of the term of Mr. Smith ought to have elected his successor or not, because it is admitted that in the case of Uriah Tracy, and Samuel Smith, and one other case, it does appear that a governor's appointment was held legal and valid although there had been a legislature in session at a date previous to the expiration of the term and the commencement of the new term which might have filled the vacancy.

Those are the only cases. They occurred between 1805 and 1809. In 1825, however, the case of James Lanman was decided, and that case was understood all over the country by those who were then in the Senate, by those who acted afterwards in the Senate, by the governors of all the States throughout the United States to settle the question that the governor could not appoint where there had been a legislature in session in anticipation of the vacancy which could have filled it.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] called the attention of the Senate the other day to the fact that in Indiana the State went partially represented for at least two years because the legislature was unable to fill the vacancy. The Senator from Nevada said that California went unrepresented for two years—I think he said eight years—because the vacancy which could be foreseen and anticipated had not been filled by the legislature and because the legislature had attempted to fill it and had failed. And the fact remains that from 1825 to 1879 no governor in the United States presumed or attempted to make a temporary appointment of a Senator where a legislature had been in session which could have filled that vacancy, whether it had attempted to do it or not. There were many such cases. There are so many such cases that it is utterly impossible to say that that proposition was not considered settled, absolutely settled, in 1825 by the Lanman case. I wish to advert to a few of those cases, and especially because one happened in Connecticut.

In Connecticut a vacancy occurred March 4, 1851. The legislature then convened annually in May. The legislature which sat in the May previous, namely, in 1850, was the legislature charged with the election of a Senator. At that May session an attempt was made to choose a Senator, and after several ballotings the whole subject of the election of a Senator was, upon motion, indefinitely postponed. The governor did not appoint. In the May session of 1851, the next year, the seat having been vacant from March 4, 1851, until the May session of the legislature of 1851, the matter came before the legislature, and the legislature took 22 ballots in its endeavor to elect a Senator, and, becoming convinced that it was impossible to agree, again, on motion, indefinitely postponed the election of a Senator.

No action was taken by the governor, and in 1852, in May, the legislature again met and elected a Senator, who took his seat, Hon. Isaac Toucey. So from March 4, 1851, until some time in May or June, 1852, the State of Connecticut had only one representative in the Senate, because it supposed, and because everybody supposed, that the governor could not under those circumstances appoint and because it had never, after 1825, been claimed that the governor under such circumstances could appoint.

In Maine there was a Senatorial vacancy in 1853. The legislature made repeated efforts to elect, and it was not filled until the next succeeding legislature. The governor made no appointment.

In Pennsylvania a vacancy occurred March 4, 1855, and the legislature, at its session beginning in January, 1855, tried to elect a Senator, but failed to do so, and adjourned May 8 without effecting a choice. The next year, January 14, 1856, Senator Bigler was elected by the legislature.

The governor of Pennsylvania in 1856 and 1857 did not suppose that he could appoint under those circumstances. The clause in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania which requires the governor, in case he finds a vacancy existing during the recess of the legislature, to summon the legislature together did not exist, but the governor of Pennsylvania at that time did not suppose that he could appoint; otherwise there would have been some one here claiming under the governor's appointment. That is Pennsylvania.

In Maryland a vacancy occurred March 4, 1843. The legislature assembled December 26, 1842, and continued in session until March 10, 1843, after the time when the vacancy occurred, when it adjourned without electing a Senator to fill the vacancy. The vacancy was not filled until the next regular session of the legislature, and the State of Maryland was a year with only partial representation in this body.

In North Carolina a vacancy occurred March 4, 1853. The legislature assembled in November, 1852, and made repeated efforts to elect, but adjourned without an election. They elected in 1854.

The State of North Carolina had one vacant seat in the Senate for eighteen months. These new-light lawyers who say that the great thing that was thought about was that the Senate should be kept full had not been heard from then. The governors of the States did not suppose that they had the right to keep the Senate full, ignoring or overriding those provisions of the Constitution which the Senate had declared in 1825 were to be observed.

In Indiana a vacancy occurred March 4, 1855. The legislature tried to elect. The senate refused to go into joint convention, and the legislature failed to elect until 1857, two whole years. That is the case to which the Senator from Massachusetts, for some purpose or other, I do not know what, called the attention of the Senate the other day.

In Missouri there was a vacancy from March 4, 1855, until December 29, 1856, almost two years, and the State of Missouri went without a representative on this floor, the legislature having tried to elect and failed to do so.

In California the State was represented by only one Senator from March 4, 1855, until January 5, 1857—two years nearly; and there was no claim that the governor could appoint.

In Oregon a vacancy existed from the 4th of March, 1856, until the 19th day of December, 1857, the legislature having declined to elect and the governor not appointing.

Again, in Oregon in 1859 a vacancy occurred; and as this is rather a remarkable case I wish to call attention to it somewhat particularly. They held an extra session of the legislature in May, 1859. That was soon after the vacancy occurred. The governor did not attempt to appoint at the commencement of the vacancy. A special session was held. That special session attempted to fill the vacancy, and adjourned June 4, 1859, without filling it. Then the regular session was held September 10, 1860, when repeated attempts were made to elect, until October 10, 1860, a motion was made to postpone the election of United States Senator; which motion prevailed. I do not know when they finally succeeded in electing a Senator in Oregon, but, at any rate, the place went vacant for nearly two years. The governor did not assume to appoint.

Mr. President, it can not be possible that all these vacancies should have been submitted to, if it had not been the understanding throughout the length and breadth of the United States that where a legislature had met, had attempted to fill a vacancy, and had failed, the governor had no right to appoint. I am contending for the observance of what has been settled, and if anything on earth has been settled or can be settled, it is that; and its settlement is not to be argued alone from the fact that governors have not attempted to exercise the power of appointment under similar circumstances, but upon the few contested and decided cases in the Senate, to which I have already adverted, especially the case of Mantle, where an attempt had been made to elect, and the legislature had failed to elect.

The Senator from Massachusetts has the right idea with reference to standing by the decisions of the Senate even though thought to be wrong; but he fails to make the application in this case. Senators will remember the Du Pont case, in which his claim was not agreed to, and it was declared, after hearing and argument, that he was not entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Senators will remember that Mr. Du Pont came at the next session of the Senate and asked to have the case reopened and reheard. The Senator from Massachusetts made a report upon that case. I wish that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire would abide by what I think is the principle stated in that report.

It is true, Mr. President, that the present case is not that of a Senator who has been re ected coming and asking to have his case reopened. It is the case of a Senator coming under precisely the same claims as a Senator who has been rejected and asking that his case may be decided differently.

What did the Senator from Massachusetts say? I agree to every word of it. He said:

> The simple question is: Whether the Senate, nowithstanding its decision of May 15, 1896, will now admit Mr. Du Pont to a seat?
> The majority of your committee now, as then, are of the opinion that this decision of the Senate was wrong; but the Senate is made by the Constitution the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members, and its judgment is just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency, when it is rendered by one majority as when it is unanimous.

I commend that language to the Senator from Massachusetts. He seems to think a decision the Senate rendered by a majority of three is not binding.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator ought not to be unfair.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to be.

Mr. CHANDLER. And he ought to be also just to himself. He knows very well the difference between standing by a decision of the Senate not to admit Mr. Du Pont when Mr. Du Pont came a second time on the same credentials and standing by some doctrine that may have been affirmed in some particular case by a majority of the Senate when another case just like it arises. The Senator from Connecticut is not just to either the Senator from Massachusetts or to myself in making his argument precisely as he makes it. If he will read the statement, it will show what the Senator from Massachusetts said.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will read it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If Mr. Corbett were to come here now, I would not be for admitting him; but when Mr. Quay comes, it is a different thing.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But suppose Mr. Corbett came here with Mr. Quay's case; do you think he should be admitted to the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should be for his admission. There is nothing in that report which indicates the slightest reason why he should not be admitted.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I repeat the question. Suppose Mr. Corbett came here with precisely the case which Mr. Quay has; do you think he would be admitted?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to reply to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. That report is an affirmance of the doctrine of res adjudicata: that is, that where a court having jurisdiction over the matter has determined the title of the individual to a particular thing, in the ordinary case of a court to a piece of land, or in the case of a Senator's seat in the Senate, that decision can not be wiped out and the particular thing claimed given because of a change in the making up of the court afterwards.

It is the doctrine known in law as the doctrine of res adjudicata, and that doctrine the Senator will find a still stronger affirmation, of which I also was the author, in the Kellogg case from Louisiana, if he chooses to look at it. That, however, has nothing whatever to do with the question whether a court in another case would overrule a mistaken opinion of law. Courts never disregard the doctrine of res adjudicata; never, anywhere; courts everywhere overrule old decisions which they think wrong as to doctrine in new like cases.

Now, the Senator is striving—not purposely, of course—to confound two things, in regard to which I suppose every lawyer and every intelligent citizen understands the distinction. So, if the Senator will permit me, I have to say two things: First, that that report had nothing whatever to do with the question whether, if the Senate established in an old case, in a former case, a wrong principle, they may overrule that and now establish a right one.

The other thing I have to say is that it seems to my humble apprehension as clear as daylight that the Senate is not overruling its former doctrine or precedents if it now admits Mr. Quay; but, on the contrary, that the refusal to admit Mr. Quay overrules in principle and substance a series of well-established decisions, established on full debate and careful consideration; and that when my honorable friend undertakes to distinguish this case from the Sevier case, or the Smith case of old; when he undertakes to distinguish it in principle from the Blair case or the Bell case recently decided, all he has to say, in substance, is, "Why, we never admitted a man who had blue eyes under such circumstances, and Mr. Bell had black eyes." That is the distinction he makes. That has nothing to do with the substance and principle of the doctrine, as it seems to me.

I say this not, I hope, with any arrogant desire to set up my opinion against an opinion I value so highly as that of the Senator from Connecticut and of other Senators who differ from me, but I say it as expressing my own opinion, because the Senator is charging me with an inconsistency.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, I am not charging the Senator with an inconsistency; at least I made no such charge. Possibly it may be difficult for him or for me to reconcile what he stated in the Du Pont report with his action at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. I find it very easy to do so.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I agree that that was a motion for a rehearing of the same case, but I think the principles enunciated by the Senator from Massachusetts in denying that rehearing applied just as much to a precisely similar case brought by some one else. Let us see. Suppose that at the next session after the Du Pont case was decided some man had come from the State of Pennsylvania under precisely the same state of facts and circumstances which led the Senate to reject——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let me finish my sentence.

Which led the Senate to reject Mr. Du Pont, would not the reasoning have been just as strong that the Senate should not depart from its former decision as it was that the Senate should not reopen the Du Pont case?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if that precise thing had happened, if the Senator will pardon me, I know I can say for myself, and I have no doubt I can say for the majority of the committee who signed that report, that they would have voted, every man of them, to have admitted that claimant from Pennsylvania to his seat; and when the Corbett case was decided I gave notice of my individual purpose, whenever the question came up in another case, to act on what I regarded as the correct view.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, in the Du Pont case we voted in favor of Mr. Du Pont because Governor Watson while governor cast a vote which we held was void. If Delaware had gone on and elected another Senator by the same vote, and Governor Watson had voted against him, of course we would have been in favor of seating him; but when Mr. Du Pont came and asked for a reopening of his case the doctrine of res adjudicata applied.

Mr. HOAR. Of course we would have been in favor of seating him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want to read what the Senator said in that case, and I wish Senators would listen to it. I wish to see if the contention of the Senator in that case, as stated in this report, does not apply with just as much force to the Corbett case, under precisely similar circumstances, after the Senate reversed its former action, as it does in the Du Pont case. That report says:

> It is clear that the word "judge" in the Constitution was used advisedly. The Senate in the case provided for is to declare a result depending upon the application of law to existing facts, and is not to be affected in its action by the desire of its members or by their opinions as to public policies or public interest. Its action determines great constitutional rights—the title of an individual citizen to a high office and the title of a sovereign State to be represented in the Senate by the person of its choice. We can not doubt that this declaration of the Senate is a judgment in the sense in which that word is used by judicial tribunals.

The decision of the Senate in the Corbett case was a judgment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Against Mr. Corbett.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By a high constitutional court.

Mr. CHANDLER. Against Mr. Corbett.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have heard a great deal said in this debate about this being a question of high constitutional privilege; and I am glad now to quote the Senator from Massachusetts as saying that the decision of this Senate is the judgment of a high constitutional court. The report continues:

> We can conceive of no case which can arise in human affairs where it is more important that a judgment of any court should be respected and should stand unaffected by caprice or anything likely to excite passion or to tempt virtue. When the Senate decided the question it was sitting as a high constitutional court. In its action we think it ought to respect the principles, in giving effect to its own decision, which have been established in other judicial tribunals in like cases and which the experience of mankind has found safe and salutary.

Then the Senator proceeded to apply his reasoning to the precise case, the Du Pont case; but those are general principles which apply just as well to the Quay case as they did to the Du Pont case.

I want to repeat here; I want to emphasize it; I want to challenge any Senator to deny it, that Mr. Quay's case presents no claim that was not considered and affected and decided in the judgment in the Corbett case—the judgment of a high constitutional court, the judgment of a court as sacred and as binding as the judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I want to ask this question: In the law providing a temporary government for Hawaii, as the bill first came here, it made the supreme court of the Territory of Hawaii the judge of the qualification of the members of the senate and house. Suppose that had been a clause in the Constitution of the United States that the Supreme Court should be the judge of the elections and qualifications of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the Supreme Court two years ago in a case precisely similar to the one presented to the Senate to-day had, by a majority of 7 to 2, decided against the right of Mr. Corbett to a seat in this body, and suppose two years thereafter the same case, the same facts, the same claims, the same principles should be presented to the Supreme Court and they had decided that Mr. Quay was entitled to a seat——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When I get through with my illustration.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator had been sitting as a member of that Supreme Court, and had been one who delivered a dissenting opinion, would he think it his duty whenever the same case came up again, and as long as it might come up, and as many times as it might come up, to go on dissenting, or would he feel that he ought to be bound by the decision that had been rendered by so large a majority of the court?

Mr. HOAR. I am much obliged to the Senator, because his question suggests what I was about to put to him, and it illustrates this whole thing.

In the case of Hepburn & Griswold, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the legal-tender law was unconstitutional. Two years after the Supreme Court of the United States changed its mind, and held, in another case, that the same law—the legal-tender law—was constitutional.

If at the time of that second judgment Hepburn or Griswold, the losing party in that cause, had come into the Supreme Court and said, "I ask you to give me back the money which was awarded to me by your old judgment," or costs, or the debt, or whatever it was, the court would have said, "No; that is res adjudicata. Your case is settled forever between you and your antagonist by a judgment; but that judgment went on erroneous principles, and every new case that comes before us will be decided otherwise."

That is just what they would have said, and my friend from Connecticut, I think, knows that and believes that just as I do. I can not doubt that so good a lawyer as is the Senator is sure I am stating exactly what would have happened, and rightly happened. They would not have made a new judgment in the old case, but they would have adopted a different principle in the new case, thinking they were wrong in the old one.

Now, I agree that in regard to overruling old judicial mistakes it should not lightly be done, and that a judge who does not believe the doctrine should hesitate, and only for a good reason overrule that decision. But I hold also that in a Senate, which, though a court, is a political body, when a Senator believes that an old case has been decided in violation of the constitutional right, the most sacred right in the Constitution, namely, the right to equality in the Senate, and when he not only believes, but knows, as I do, that the old decision was a decision influenced not by arguments upon the law, but by political considerations of how the Senator who claimed his seat was going to vote, or by such other political considerations as were urged upon the Senate in the Corbett case in argument openly in regard to some alleged misconduct of his in an election, I think that Senator is not only justified to declare the law as he understands it, but that he is bound, as a matter of constitutional duty, of sworn duty, so to declare it.

Now, let me repeat, if I may—and then I will not trouble the Senator again—the Supreme Court of the United States has more than once overruled old opinions, not as you will if you decide in favor of Mr. Quay, going back through a long series of decisions which were violated in the Corbett case, but overruling decisions which it had made in the past, and only because they were wrong. If at the same moment the Supreme Court were to overrule a former decision and a party to the former decision came into that court and said, "Now, you must set me right also," this same court, if they were unanimous, would unanimously say, "No; we can overrule a wrong principle of law, but we can not set aside a wrong judgment."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I weary the Senate, I wish to have the time taken by the Senator from Massachusetts charged to him and not to me.

I wonder if the Senator thinks that the Senate is more virtuous now than it was when the Corbett case was considered. If not, why is this continual representation made that the Mantle case and the Corbett case were decided by Senators without reference to their obligation to the Constitution as they believed it to be? Why this continual reiteration?

Does the Senator believe that the Senate is more virtuous now than it was then? Does the Senator believe that Senators are going to act with him now from the highest constitutional motives when they failed to act with him then from the highest constitutional motives; or is this brought up as an excuse for Senators who are expected to vote now "by caprice, or something likely to excite passion or tempt virtue," and so enable the constitutional contention of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire to prevail?

I am bound to read all this report, because, as I said, it applies to the Du Pont case. I was interrupted. I proceed:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where by reason of fraud or accident it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or error or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases. But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their mind as to the law or fact which is involved.

All that is made specifically applicable to the Du Pont case. But the general principle stated here goes much further and broader than where it is sought to reopen the particular case:

> It seems to us very important to the preservation of constitutional government, very important to the dignity and authority of the Senate, very important to the peace of the country, that we should abide by this principle. There are few greater temptations which affect the conduct of men than the temptation to seize upon political power without regard to the obligation of law. To act upon the doctrine upon which this petition rests would expose the Senate to the temptation to reverse its own judgments and to vacate or to award seats in this Chamber according as the changing majorities should make possible. If such practice should be admitted it would, in our opinion, go far to weaken the respect due to this body and the respect due to constitutional authority.

Mr. President, the question which I asked the Senator from New Hampshire is still unanswered. If Mr. Corbett now, with the same case as Mr. Quay presents to the Senate, were here asking to be seated, does anybody in the Senate suppose he would be seated? That question will not be affirmatively answered in the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts is talking about the doctrine of res adjudicata. I am talking about the doctrine of stare decisis, and neither the Senate of the United States nor the Supreme Court nor any other court can, within two years, in a case like this, overrule its former decision, there being only the precise facts in the one case which are in the other, without doing violence to the doctrine of stare decisis. I know cases may be overruled; they are overruled; mistakes in law are made and they should be corrected; but nevertheless the doctrine of the ages has been that they should not be overruled except where the gravest considerations demand it.

I want to state that doctrine fully. It requires very controlling considerations to induce any court to break over a former decision and lay again the foundations of the law. What controlling considerations are there here? What grave controlling considerations exist here when the Quay case is presented to compel the Senate to overrule its former judgment in a precisely similar case delivered only two years ago and by a majority of 50 to 19? There must be controlling considerations in order to justify it. Will some Senator tell us what they are? But, Mr. President, I have dwelt thus at length——

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. What were the considerations which actuated the Senate to overrule the precedents of twenty-five years in 1825?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the question?

Mr. DANIEL. What were the considerations which actuated the Senate in overruling the four or five cases antecedent to the Lanman case, reversing in the Lanman case the early jurisprudence of the country, decisions by men who were fresh from the adoption of the Constitution? What were those considerations?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The most noted case which occurred prior to the Lanman case was the first case which occurred, which was the Johns case. In that case the decision was that a Senator was not entitled to be seated under an executive appointment if there had been a legislature in session which could have filled the vacancy. That was the original decision. That was the interpretation put upon the Constitution by six or seven men who were in the first Senate of 30.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will state that the legislature had been in session in the case of John Walker, of Virginia, who had been admitted prior to that without dissent in the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The case of John Walker is not reported here.

Mr. DANIEL. No; it is not reported in Taft.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is not reported here. The case of John Walker, so far as I know, was not contested. There was no question raised about it. It went sub silentio if that doctrine was involved. But in five years after the organization of the Senate came the Kensey Johns case, presenting the same identical question as to whether a governor could appoint after a legislature had been in session which might have filled that vacancy, and the Senate decided that he could not, and it was put on that ground.

Between that time and 1825 the question does not seem to have been particularly considered. However that may be, and why persons were admitted at that time, when there had been legislatures which might have elected before the governor appointed, it was settled conclusively in 1825 that that could not be done; it was acquiesced in for more than fifty years; and there is no decision since which overturns that. So for seventy-five years at least it has been acquiesced in in this country and decided by the Senate whenever it has come up that the governor could not appoint if there had been a legislature in session which had the opportunity to elect.

That is all that was decided in the Bell case. All that the Bell case or the Blair case decided, as presented here, was that there had been no legislature there which could elect. All that the Senator from New Hampshire claims for the Bell case is that it was a question of doubt whether the legislature could elect or not. That question of doubt evidently determined the case. I scarcely need refer to it.

There were two legislatures elected in New Hampshire in the year 1878, by reason of a change in the State constitution, the vacancy falling March 4, 1879. By the statute passed in 1865, and which I have cited, the last legislature was chosen in November prior to the happening of the vacancy, and that legislature did not sit till June. It was claimed that the old legislature which sat the May previous was the last chosen legislature, but the Senate held it was not. I think that is all that can be claimed for the Blair case.

I do not think it is necessary for me to dwell longer upon the fact that to admit Mr. Quay to a seat here is not only to reverse the settled decisions of the Senate, but to go a step further, forward or backward, as Senators may prefer to call it, and seat a man under circumstances under which no man was ever before seated in the Senate of the United States upon an executive appointment.

But the Senator from New Hampshire says that the Constitution permits it. To be sure, the Senate has always decided against him and against the argument which he raises now; but he says he is not and he will not be bound by the decision of the Senate; and he says in effect that so often as the opportunity offers he will insist that he is right and the Senate is wrong. I do not think it is necessary to dwell much upon this interpretation of the Constitution.

The Senator from New Hampshire finds himself forced, in order to maintain his interpretation of the Constitution, to read words into it. That is where he places his argument. He says the change of one word in the Constitution will make it read according to his contention; that is, to strike out the word "happen" where it occurs in the language "happen during the recess," and insert the word "exist," so as to read "exist during the recess."

The difficulty with the Senator's argument is that the word "exist" is not there, and the word "happen" is, and that the members of the Constitutional Convention could just as well have put the word "exist" there as the word "happen," and that they do not mean the same thing. They certainly do not where the word "happen" is used with reference to an event and in connection with a specified date or time. I challenge the Senator, or any Senator, to find in the English language a sentence where the word "happen" is used in connection with a time or a date when it is not limited in its meaning to that time or date. This is a challenge that remains open, and until it is taken up it must be held that "happen" does not mean the same thing as "exist."

Or, he says that you can read three words into the Constitution and then it will be satisfactory. Cut out the words "If vacancies happen" and insert the words "In case of vacancies." Here the same trouble comes again. Those words are not in the Constitution. The Senator finds it necessary to change the language of the Constitution to maintain his interpretation of it. And then, in the third place, he says he can get what he wants out of the Constitution by transposing the language of the Constitution.

The Senator must have been studying the puzzle columns of some of the weekly papers, where the favorite puzzle is to read a sentence both ways, backward and forward, and have it mean precisely the opposite thing when read backward from what it does when read forward. That is his argument. What does he think a court would say to the claim that the Constitution should be interpreted by transposing its language?

Mr. President, that is not the way to construe the Constitution. To attempt to construe the Constitution in that way shows the weakness of the contention. Did the members of the Constitutional Convention understand the use of language? Did they know what words they were using? Did they know what was the meaning of the words they were using? Did they use words idly or inadvertently? Not at all, Mr. President. If there ever was a document in the whole world where words are used with precise meaning that document is the Constitution of the United States.

Now, the Senator says that at some time during the deliberations of the Convention this language was agreed to:

Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature.

I want to ask the Senator this: If the language which is in the present Constitution—means the same thing, what necessity was there for putting it there? That is the question I want answered. I want to know why the words "during the recess of the legislature" were put in there after other language had been agreed to? It is an unanswerable question. It settles this whole contention. If it had been provided before the Constitution went to the committee on style that all vacancies, however happening or whenever happening, might be filled by the executive, why were the words "during the recess of the legislature" put into the Constitution?

If vacancies happen * * * during the recess of the legislature—

It does not do to say they were put there by the committee on style unauthorized to be put there; that the Convention did not know it, and therefore let them pass without observation. The clause, as finally referred to the committee on style, was:

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

If that meant, when it went to the committee on style, that all vacancies might be filled by the governor no matter when they happened, and the clause only means the same now, why were the words "during the recess of the legislature" inserted? They were absolutely ill chosen to make it plain that the governor might appoint to any vacancy. They did not make it plain that that was the meaning. They mean something else, when they are put there, than that all vacancies may be filled by the governor, no matter when they happen or occur.

The Senator says that was the will of the Convention; that is what they understood; that is what they meant—namely, that whenever or however a vacancy happened, it should be filled by the governor until the next meeting of the legislature. Now, if so, why did they put in the words "happen during the recess of the legislature?"

Mr. CHANDLER. No; I do not mean that an appointment might be made by the governor at all times.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When the legislature is not in session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I admit that the committee on style made a provision that the governor should not make an appointment while the legislature was in session. That is why they put that clause in. But they did not undertake to prohibit the governor from making an appointment when there was a vacancy under any conditions except that he could not make it when the legislature was in session, and they put in the words "during the recess of the legislature" for that purpose and no other.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Did anybody ever suppose it might be construed or contended that the governor could make the appointment if the legislature was in session?

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly that is the theory upon which the committee on style put it in.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; it is not the theory upon which the committee on style put it in, in my judgment; it impugns the intelligence of the members of the Convention to suppose that they inserted the words "during the recess of the legislature" to prevent a governor from appointing a Senator while the legislature was in session to hold until the next meeting of the legislature. The Senator refers to what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] says in his report and his address; the Senator from Tennessee is amply able to take care of himself; but in my judgment those words were put in there to render certain what had been in the mind of the Convention and its members all the while, and that was that the legislature should elect whenever there was an opportunity when it could elect, and the governor should appoint only if there was no opportunity for the legislature to elect, and the language all along justifies that.

But first it must be remembered that the desire of the Convention was that the legislatures should elect the Senators. There was great contention over that. That was one of the storm centers of the Convention—that and the equality of representation, that the smaller States should have the same representation as the larger States. Those constituted the two storm centers. Some members had proposed that they should be elected by the house of delegates, the lower house. Others had proposed that they should be elected by the people. But the Convention said that they should be "chosen" by the legislatures of the States.

Now, if we have to assume purposes in order to make arguments as to what the Constitution means, let us assume for the moment that it is not true that every member of that Convention by day and by night was consumed with the single purpose of keeping the Senate always full, but that they did have in mind the election of Senators by the legislature. Turn to Mr. Madison's explanation of this sentence in the Federalist and you will find that he does not even speak of the appointment of Senators by the governor. He dwells upon the election of Senators by the legislature. And so reading prior phrases as proposed to go into the Constitution up to the time of its final adoption, you find them all consistent with the idea, the central idea, of the Convention and its members, that the legislature should elect whenever it was possible to do so, and the governor should only appoint when it was impossible for the legislature to do so.

Senators may take which horn of the dilemma they please. Either those words were put in there to express what had been the previous intention of the Convention or they were put in there to change what had been the previous intention of the Convention.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Connecticut want an answer?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I say the Senator may take either horn of the dilemma he pleases. If they were put in there to express what had gone before, it must be considered that what had gone before was the same idea which is expressed by those words, namely, that an appointment can be made by the governor only when a vacancy happens or occurs during the recess of the legislature.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Wait a moment. If they were put in there to change what had gone before, they did change it. If they were put there to render certain the intention of the Convention, then it is manifest that the intention of the framers of the Constitution had been from the start only to allow the governor to appoint when there had been no opportunity for the legislature to make an appointment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator ought to let me state that they were put in there so that the governor should not make an appointment during the session of the legislature, not that he should not make an appointment when the legislature was not in session, for a vacancy happening or existing under any conditions. My contention is just as likely to be the correct one as is the Senator's.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. To maintain the contention of the Senator from New Hampshire and those who agree with him drives those who maintain it into ludicrous and absurd situations.

Does anybody suppose— the Senator has been diligent in searching the debates of the Convention—that the members of that Convention thought, after they had said that Senators should be chosen by the legislature, and that a vacancy might be supplied by the governor, that it could be supplied by the governor when the legislature was in session? Does anybody really suppose they thought that?

Did anybody ever think, until the matter was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire this morning, that that was the reason why those words were put into the Constitution? This method of interpreting the Constitution reminds me of the ingenuity of the Baconian theory of Shakespeare, as it is called. The first thing to do is to invent a cipher and then apply it to the Shakespeare plays, and it proves that Shakespeare did not write Shakespeare and Bacon did. In order to prove what they want to prove by the Constitution they have to invent a cipher, and the trouble is that nobody believes that the cipher they have invented is the true one at all.

Right in this connection, the other idea that these people who were framing the Constitution were worried night and day about providing some method of keeping the Senate always full, has had a wonderful growth, a wonderful evolution. We never heard of it, I think, until the opinion of Attorney-General William Wirt, and we never heard much about it until the Bell case and the Blair case. Since then is has grown by the meat it has fed upon until it has become in the minds of Senators who want to seat Mr. Quay the overshadowing and controlling consideration which was in the minds of the men who framed the Constitution. There is no evidence of it. The only evidence in the debates of the Constitutional Convention is found in two instances.

One when Mr. Randolph, I think it was, said if they did not give the governor power to make temporary appointments there might be "inconvenient chasms." He did not seem to be troubled by the fact that there might be a chasm occasionally; he was troubled by the idea of "inconvenient" chasms. Mr. Ellsworth, who limited the power of the governor to make temporary appointments by the use of the word "may," said that if the legislature was to be soon in session the governor would not appoint; he would not exercise that power. So the overwhelming consideration was not to keep the Senate always full. It was admitted that the governor would not exercise this power at all times; that there might be times when the Senate would not be kept full.

It was not mandatory upon the governor. It was a permissive power given to the governor in order to avoid inconvenience, and nothing more. And yet it is now made the foundation upon which the Constitution is to have words read into it and read out of it, upon which its plain meaning is to be changed, and words made to mean something other than what they apparently mean, all because the Senate was always to be kept full. Where is the evidence of it? I think it entirely more probable that it never entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution that there would be any difficulty about a legislature refusing to elect a Senator to the Senate.

The Convention did indeed prescribe means whereby a State might keep its representation always full in the Senate. They did that, and that is all they did, and all they intended to do.

But, Mr. President, whatever their intention may have been, however strong their desire may have been that the Senate should always be kept full, it does not justify juggling with the words of the Constitution and torturing their meaning. I believe that what they were thinking about was the choice of Senators by State legislatures, and I do not know that that has ever been any better expressed than by Mr. Madison, in the Federalist, where he says:

> That, through the medium of the State legislatures, who are select bodies of men, and who are to appoint the members of the national Senate, there is reason to expect that this branch will generally be composed with peculiar care and judgment; that these circumstances promise greater knowledge and more comprehensive information in the national councils; and that on account of the extent of the country from which will be drawn those to whose direction they will be committed, they will be less apt to be tainted by the spirit of faction, and more out of the reach of those occasional ill humors or temporary prejudices and propensities which in smaller societies frequently contaminate the public deliberations, beget injustice and oppression toward a part of the community, and engender schemes which, though they gratify a momentary inclination or desire, terminate in general distress, dissatisfaction, and disgust.

That represents what was in the minds of the members who framed the Constitution, and yet an interpretation is contended for here which would give the power of appointment of Senators, not only one, but two, forever to the governors in certain contingencies such as have occurred in legislatures in recent days. Suppose a legislature can never elect by reason of "faction, ill humor, or passion," is the governor always to appoint? Was that in the minds of the men who framed the Constitution?

No, Mr. President; they did provide the means whereby a State might be fully represented at all times by the election by the legislature when the legislature had the opportunity to elect, and by the temporary appointment of the governor when the legislature had had no opportunity to elect, but that does not justify doing violence to the Constitution, nor to the statute even.

Suppose the legislature undertakes to disregard the statute only. The statute provides:

> The legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceeded to elect a Senator in Congress.

Suppose they proceed on the third Tuesday and not on the second; will the Committee on Privileges and Elections waive that in order to keep the Senate always full? Suppose they proceed to elect the very next day after they get together, claiming that time is of no consequence. The time when an election occurs is of no more consequence than the time when a vacancy occurs. Suppose they proceed to elect the very next day after they get together; will the Committee on Privileges and Elections waive that in order that the Senate may always be kept full?

This statute provides that they shall first proceed to elect in each house of the legislature, and if they agree they shall on the next day go into a joint assembly and proclaim the result: but in case there is no election by the separate houses, the joint assembly shall proceed to elect. Suppose a legislature does not act by its separate houses. They did not before the passage of the statute. Suppose a legislature immediately on its assembling goes into joint convention without having previously voted in either house and proceeds to elect a Senator and sends him here; will the Committee on Privileges and Elections seat him upon the plea that the Senate must always be full?

The choice of the legislature would be thus expressed. It would simply have failed to comply with the technicalities of the statute. Would that be permitted in order to keep the Senate always full?

No, Mr. President, it is inconceivable to my mind that anybody should say that these words, "During the recess of the legislature," used in connection with the word "happen" do not limit the power of the governor to appoint to those vacancies which occur during the recess of the legislature.

A final word, Mr. President. The Senate is on trial at the bar of public opinion in the United States. This case is known throughout the length and breadth of the United States. It is known that it resembles in every particular a case which was decided two years ago by a vote of 50 to 19 in the Senate adverse to the claim which is now made. The people of the United States will want to know why the Senate changes front in this respect.

They will hear that it has been said in this discussion on the floor of the Senate that enough Senators voted in the Corbett case against the prior idea of what the construction of the Constitution should be to change the result because of the political views of Mr. Corbett, or because of some supposed circumstances which happened before or during the attempt of the legislature to organize rather than upon constitutional considerations, and if this case reverses the Corbett case the people of the United States will believe that considerations other than those to be found in the Constitution lie at the foundation of the vote.

This, Mr. President, is why I implore Senators to stand by the former decisions of the Senate. This is why I appeal to Senators to consider things which have been long settled as settled, and not attempt to reopen them.

If the decision in the Corbett case shall be reversed, there will never be any settlement in the Senate on this question under the Constitution. No case hereafter will be settled or attempted to be settled as Senators believe that under the Constitution it should be settled. They will be decided upon likes and dislikes, upon political interests and exigencies, for revenge or for friendship.

Mr. President, why have those terms been drawn into this discussion? Why has the picture been presented to us here of the former Senator from Pennsylvania as a good man and a brave soldier, endeared by association of his twelve years' service to Senators here? Why are "friends and enemies" of Mr. Quay alluded to in this discussion? Once overturn what has been already settled in the Senate and nothing is ever to be settled hereafter, but a seat in the Senate is to be the sport and play of political or personal friendships or enmities.

Mr. President, there are no enemies of Mr. Quay here. In the consideration of this case there should be no friends—that is to say, no one on account of his friendship should vote for Mr. Quay—no one should vote for him on that ground alone. Let it once go out to the people of this country that a Senator is to be seated because a majority of the Senate like him, and because he is endeared to them by long association, because he is a good man or a brave man, and a Senator who comes here who is not liked and who is not endeared to them by association, who can not be said to be a great man or a brave man, is not to be seated, the Senate from that hour will sink into deserved disrepute.

Mr. President, the old fable of the lawyer and the ox, in which the lawyer is made to say that it makes a difference whose ox is gored, has always stood in literature as the keenest satire ever leveled against partiality in the administration of justice. Can it be possible that the Senate, in its decision, is about to illustrate that old fable anew? If the judgment in the Corbett case, deliberately made, is now to be reversed for the benefit of Mr. Quay, will not the people have a right to ask whether the Senate has not, like the lawyer in the fable, taken into consideration the ownership of the ox? The present claimant of this seat in the Senate, who thought less than two years ago that Mr. Corbett should be rejected, now comes with a case admittedly weaker, and asks a decision in his favor. If the Senate shall accede to his request, the people will have a right to ask, and will not be slow to ask, upon what grounds the reversal of the Senate's decision rests. Thereafter, Mr. President, whoever shall desire to aim a shaft of satire against the inconstancy, the favoritism, the partiality of the Senate, will find one ready pointed for his bow.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I approach the consideration of this subject with no hope that anything I may say will throw light upon a question that has for more than a century been argued by the ablest and most distinguished lawyers of the Republic; and were it not for the fact that I cast my vote against the seating of Mr. Corbett upon the appointment of the governor of Oregon, I should not now detain the Senate. In justice to myself, however, I feel that I should explain why I could vote against the seating of Mr. Corbett and yet vote for seating Mr. Quay.

The full term of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay, senior United States Senator from Pennsylvania, expired on the 3d day of March, A. D. 1899, while the legislature of that State was in session. At the beginning of said session a concurrent resolution was offered in the Senate fixing the time for adjournment on the 20th day of April following. This resolution unanimously passed both houses. It then became a standing rule of the legislature and could not be changed except by a two-thirds vote.

On the evening of January 3, 1899, a Republican caucus was called for the purpose of nominating a person to be voted for as the Republican candidate for the office of United States Senator. At this caucus several candidates were voted for, but Senator Quay, having received 98 out of the 109 Republican votes present, was unanimously declared the caucus nominee of the Republican party.

Under the act of assembly of January 11, 1867, regulating the election of United States Senators, the legislature proceeded to ballot on the third Tuesday of January, 1899, and continued to ballot each succeeding day until the legislature adjourned on the 20th of April, as aforesaid. Inasmuch as none of the candidates received a majority of the votes cast, no election resulted. Seventy-nine ballots had been taken when the legislature adjourned without day on the date above mentioned. On the 21st day of April, 1899, the legislature having adjourned without an election of a United States Senator, the governor, under the provisions of section 2 of Article II of the Federal Constitution, appointed Mr. Quay to fill the vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature.

It has been urged by some that a Senator who voted against the seating of Mr. Corbett, the appointee of the governor of Oregon, could not vote for the seating of Mr. Quay and be consistent. This I deny. It is never inconsistent to be right. In the Mantle case, in 1893, 29 Senators voted favoring his claim to a seat and 32 against, and his claim was like the present case. Some Senators who voted for Mr. Mantle voted against Mr. Corbett in 1898, but his case was not like the present one, as I shall endeavor to show. There are Senators who voted against Mr. Corbett who will vote for Mr. Quay and are not inconsistent. I desire that the votes in the Mantle and Corbett cases be printed as a part of my remarks, and that the politics of each Senator be indicated.

The votes referred to are as follows:

Mr. KENNEY. The case of Mr. Corbett is, in many essentials, different from that of Mr. Quay. In the Oregon case there had not been any organization of the house of representatives of the State, and there was no legislature able to elect. After many weeks in a vain attempt to organize, the legislature, or what there was of it, adjourned, and, there having been no election of a Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of Mr. Mitchell, Governor Lord appointed Mr. Corbett, who appeared here asking to be given a seat on that appointment.

His credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and after consideration the committee made to the Senate two reports—one, the majority report, recommending that he be not seated, and the other, the minority report, favoring his claim. Without reference to the findings of the committee, it was a notorious fact that the failure of the house of representatives of Oregon to organize was due to the efforts of Mr. Corbett and his friends, and that influences other than arguments were used to accomplish this end. So that Mr. Corbett came to the Senate under the appointment of Governor Lord, after having prevented the organization of the legislature, and for the reason and with the purpose that thereby he would prevent the election of a successor to Mr. Mitchell and secure to himself the appointment for two years by the governor.

Had the Oregon legislature organized and elected Mr. Corbett, he having used the same means to secure an election which he used to insure his appointment by the governor, this Senate would have refused him a seat, and as rightly so as it did in refusing him a seat on the appointment of the governor. Not all who voted against seating Mr. Corbett were governed in their actions by that view of the Constitution taken by those who to-day oppose the seating of Mr. Quay, and those who voted against him on the grounds laid down above will be entirely consistent in voting to seat Mr. Quay. I am frank to admit that it was the former and not the latter reason which controlled my action in the Corbett case.

Were the charges against Mr. Corbett not true, and my vote against him cast wrongfully, whether from a view of the Constitution or not, I feel that to vote in the present case against Mr. Quay for the sake of being consistent, when against my clear and fixed convictions as to the right of the matter, could not be defended or justified on any ground.

In the case now before the Senate there is no charge against Mr. Quay, and by all it is admitted that the sole question is: Was the appointment of Mr. M. S. Quay by the governor of Pennsylvania legal or not? and is, therefore, wholly a legal and constitutional question.

The answer can only be found in a just and proper construction of the Constitution, and political convictions can not and must not enter into its consideration. Former action by the Senate in cases like the one now under consideration can not be held to bind members of the present body, for the reason each Senater is bound under his oath to support the Constitution, and he alone is to pass upon its meaning as understood by himself; another's construction is not to bind him nor furnish him with an interpretation contrary to his own understanding of that instrument.

The Senate owes its existence to the Constitution, and the mode of choosing the members thereof and of filling vacancies is alone prescribed by that instrument.

Section 3 of Article I of that Constitution provides that—

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years.

It was obvious, however, that vacancies might occur which would defeat the intent of always having two Senators from each State, and therefore we find in the same article this further provision:

> * * * If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The governor of Pennsylvania derived his power, if any he had, to make this appointment to fill the vacancy from this clause of the Constitution, and on its just construction rests the answer to the question.

In considering this clause we must seek for the intent of those who made it. We must not lose sight of the fact that it is the Constitution, the organic law of the country; that it was not made to cover details, but by general provisions to extend over hundreds of years and thousands of cases, the differences in which could not be foreseen. Construction does not mean to hinder, but to help; and the law charges us to remember this in seeking the general intent and purpose in the construction of the Constitution.

Chief Justice Gibson, of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Commonwealth vs. Clark (7 W. & S., page 133), said:

> A constitution is not to receive a technical construction like a common-law instrument or a statute. It is to be interpreted so as to carry out the great principles of the government, not to defeat them.

The court of appeals of New York, in The People vs. Fancher (50 New York, page 293), said:

> Indeed, the science of words alone can not control in the construction of a written constitution, which must be rather interpreted with reference to its special and general intent and the ordinary and usual sense of the phraseology than to the literal and technical meaning of the words used. (Henshaw vs. Foster County, 9 Pick., 312; Mattox vs. The United States, 156 U. S., 43.)

In construction, when doubts exist, the context is to be looked at, and if no violence is done to the fair meaning of the word or clause and you can aid the purpose shown by the context, you are bound to construe it.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden (9 Wheaton, page 4), said:

> If they contend for that narrow construction which, in support of some theory not to be found in the Constitution, would deny to the Government those powers which the words of the grant, as usually understood, import, and which are consistent with the general views and objects of the instrument; for that narrow construction, which would cripple the Government and render it unequal to the objects for which it is declared to be instituted, and to which the powers given, as fairly understood, render it competent, then we can not perceive the propriety of this strict construction, nor adopt it as the rule by which the Constitution is to be expounded.
> As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they have said. If from the imperfection of human language there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well-settled rule that the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction.

In Story on the Constitution, section 400, the rule is thus stated:

> The first and fundamental rule in the interpretation of all instruments is to construe them according to the sense of the terms and the intention of the parties. Mr. Justice Blackstone has remarked that the intention of a law is to be gathered from the words, the context, the subject-matter, the effects and consequence, or the reason and spirit of the law.
> He goes on to justify the remark by stating that words are generally to be understood in their usual and most known signification, not so much regarding the propriety of grammar as their general and popular use; that if words happen to be dubious, their meaning may be established by the context, or by comparing them with other words and sentences in the same instrument; that illustrations may be further derived from the subject-matter with reference to which the expressions are used; that the effect and consequence of a particular construction is to be examined, because if a literal meaning would involve a manifest absurdity, it ought not to be adopted; and that the reason and spirit of the law, or the causes which led to its enactment, are often the best exponents of the words and limit their application.

This clause giving the governor the power of temporary appointment is part of Article I of the Constitution, which, made by all the people of the United States, created and provided for the organization of the legislative department of the Government called the Congress, and made it to consist of the House of Representatives and the Senate. It defined how the members of each should be elected, the qualifications of each member, and how many members should constitute each body. The election of members of the House is vested in the people, but those of the Senate in the legislature of each State, and it provided not only for the election of each member but for filling the vacancies in each body.

In section 2 of Article I it is provided as to the House of Representatives that—

> When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Here first occurs the use of the word happen. It is also used in connection with a vacancy, and it is not used to denote a moment of time when the event originated or first occurred, but to denote the event itself and its duration. Surely this is most pertinent proof as to the sense in which the word happen was used in the clause now in question.

Then, in section 3 of Article I, comes this provision:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

The Senate, to complete it, to make it the body which the Constitution intended, must have two Senators from each State, for the words used are:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State.

And it emphasizes this meaning by providing that—

> Each Senator shall have one vote.

The votes are not to be by States, each State one vote, but each Senator has one vote.

As this clause shows a plain intent for a full Senate, the construction of all other clauses of Article I should be in furtherance of and not opposed to the same, and yet the opponents of the governor's power advocate a construction directly opposed to this marked intent.

Then comes, as if still further clearly impressing and declaring the intention to provide a full Senate, the provision under discussion, in these words:

> * * * If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The makers of the Constitution used the language most aptly. If the purpose had been to limit the governor's power to fill vacancies only which began in recess and not to include those which began before but continued into recess, they would have used words defining that intent and, instead of the language used, would have said, "if vacancies shall begin or originate in recess." Both the words "begin" and "originate" are left out and the word "happen" used, and so with the intent that it should include the duration of the vacancy till filled.

Senator Turpie, in discussing the question in the Mantle case in 1893, expresses himself on the use of the words "by resignation or otherwise" as follows:

The original draft of the instrument did not contain the words "by resignation or otherwise." Having done away with the obstacle in the use of the word "happen," the opponents of this construction take refuge in the phrase "by resignation or otherwise." They claim that it is a limitation upon the power of the governor, and that the vacancy which happens is one that is occasioned by resignation, or, as they claim it, "otherwise," meaning by similar modes to resignation, something like resignation.

We of the majority say that "otherwise" includes every other casualty by which a vacancy should occur; every other casualty, no matter what it may be. "Otherwise" means "other ways." Gentlemen may examine Johnson, the contemporary authority with the Constitution of the United States, the nearest contemporary, the first of English lexicographers, not the last nor the least in learning. He defines the term "otherwise" to mean "other ways, in another manner, in a different mode or manner, not in a similar way, not in the same way, not in a way like the first named." And the real question in this debate is not how a vacancy occurred, but whether it exists.

The giving to the governor the power to fill vacancies was in order that that body should be full. There could have been no other purpose in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, and that being so, and the purpose for the granting of that power, how can it be successfully contended that in cases like the present one that power shall be or is withheld? If the power was given that the Senate might be kept full, then certainly that reason should govern not in a class of vacancies, but in all.

The Senate, besides its legislative powers, has in a degree executive functions. Our foreign representatives, judges of the Federal courts, and all other officers of the Government can only be appointed by the "advice and consent of the Senate."

In these appointments, as in other matters, the President is entitled to have the advice of the Senate, not a part of that body, but that body as created and authorized by the Constitution—two from each State. This body otherwise composed is not, can not be, such a Senate as is provided for by the Constitution, neither is any representation in this body from a State which is less than two, such a representation as is provided by the Constitution that that State is entitled to. Each State is guaranteed two Senators, and it is not an answer to a different condition to say that by the failure of a legislature to do its duty that therefore all the people of the State shall suffer, and they and the Government shall be deprived of the right guarantied to both by the Constitution. In the Bell case in 1879 Mr. Edmunds said:

The Constitution is looking to have each State represented in this body all the time, and by some method that the Constitution provides, and looks to do it, and therefore when it uses the word "otherwise" it uses a comprehensive term, so that in whatever way a State ceases to have opportunity to express its full voice here in this council of States it shall be filled up temporarily by the governor until the legislature, the chief and sovereign power in the State, next meeting, can have an opportunity to fill it.

In another part of his argument in the Bell case, Senator Edmunds said:

So, then, Mr. President, I have no difficulty with this case myself after hearing all that has been said on this subject and thinking about it, and I believe if we decide it in favor of this candidate, a matter of very little practical consequence of course, because the legislature shall meet so soon, we shall have established a just and wise decision in favor of giving the people of every State, who are the persons who are really represented, the fullest opportunity in one way or another to have their seats here kept full.—Congressional Record, 1879, page 351.

Mr. President, the construction I contend for is in line with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in rules it applies to the Constitution. The breadth of construction adopted by that court in the interstate commerce and post-offices and post-roads clauses of the Constitution is in sharpest contrast with the narrowness of construction urged by those who differ with my contention. (See Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1.)

The contention that the power of the governor should be restricted because of the fear that his appointments might be personal friends must not obtain, for such a contention overlooks the fact that at the time of the making of the Constitution all the States gave to the governors thereof most ample power to make appointments. In fact, in most if not all the States then and up to a very recent period the governor appointed all State officers, including judges of all courts, attorney-generals, etc.

It is surprising that there are men who, understanding the vast and unlimited powers that were given the governors of States as to the appointment of State officers, should hold that the power to name the representative of the people of the State in the United States Senate in vacancies like the present was withheld, and so because he might in the latter case name a favorite. No fears do they entertain that in the important appointments of judges and attorney-generals he might be given to naming favorites, their fears being confined to temporary appointments to fill vacancies in the Senate.

Speaking of consistency, where is it here? Is it reasonable to presume that the framers of the Federal Constitution, in their work on that instrument, placed less trust and confidence in the governors of States in filling vacancies in the United States Senate than they did when making State constitutions, in which work many of them engaged? Certainly not. Had distrust possessed them in the one case, it would have as certainly controlled them in the other, and, therefore, this aspect of the contention must be abandoned.

Much stress is placed by those who oppose the seating of Mr. Quay on what they claim to find in the debates in the Constitutional Convention supporting their contention. Inasmuch as those who drafted the Constitution did not adopt it, little force should be given to their particular views, for there is no evidence that the great body of the people who did adopt it shared these views, be they pro or con.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania on this question, in Commonwealth vs. Balph (111 Pa. State Reports, page 380, etc.), said:

In the consideration and discussion of this action of the Constitution, I throw out of view the copious citations which have been furnished us from the debates in the convention. They are of value as showing the views of individual members and as indicating the reasons for their votes. But they give us no light as to the views of the large majority who did not talk, much less of the mass of our fellow-citizens whose votes at the polls gave that instrument the force of fundamental law. We think it safe to construe the Constitution from what appears upon its face.

Prior debates in the Senate give no aid except as an opinion of the Senator who then spoke, and the greatest care must be exercised lest it be now construed different from the sense in which he intended it.

Citation of what a Senator said in any former case is proof only of what he thought, and is no evidence of what were his associates' thoughts or of the grounds on which the particular case was decided. If the foregoing views be correct, the conclusion must be that the governor of Pennsylvania had the power, on April 21, 1899, to make the temporary appointment he did to fill the vacancy then existing in this body from that State.

But, Mr. President, there is a view of this case which I do not remember to have heard discussed by any who have spoken to the question and one which clearly demonstrates that, should the contention held by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be sustained, it might result in at least one State being, for the two years beginning with March 4, 1901, without any representative in the Senate. It is the case in the State which I now have the honor to represent in this Chamber.

By reason of the failure of legislatures to elect Senators there are to-day three States, viz. Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Utah, that are represented in this body by a single Senator each, and if the legislature which will be elected in Delaware this year should at its session in January and February next fail to elect Senators, that State would for two years be without any representative in the Senate—that is, if the contention held by those who oppose the seating of Mr. Quay should obtain and the Senate hold against seating the appointees of governors in cases like the present one.

In the cases of Pennsylvania and Utah there would not be this condition should their legislatures fail to elect in 1901, for the reason the present Senators from those States hold until 1903, while the term of the Senator from Delaware expires March 3, 1901. I am not advised that in any case of a vacancy like the one under consideration, except the one now in Delaware, there existed the possibility within two years of the State being wholly without representation in this body. With the Delaware case in mind, it is not difficult to see that it is possible for more than one State to be left without any representation in the Senate, a condition never intended by the Constitution.

Sure it is a State may submit to a single representative in this Chamber; but when it comes to no representative whatever, the opposition view would hardly restrain just indignation on the part of the people of an outraged State.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator to say that in the event of the coming election in Delaware if the legislature then elected should fail to elect a Senator, it would subject his State to the possibility of having no representation here at all.

Mr. KENNEY. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator believe that any State legislature will ever fail to agree on some candidate for the Senate unless the governor belongs to the party of the majority and will fill the vacancy anyway by naming as Senator some person who is a member of that party?

Mr. KENNEY. I appreciate the force of the Senator's inquiry, and I desire to answer it by saying that that condition did exist in my State in 1899, when the legislature was of the opposite party from the governor and failed to elect; therefore the State of Delaware was without full representation in this body. The Senator understands I mean that the governor was of a different political party from the majority of the legislature which should have elected.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did not the governor appoint?

Mr. KENNEY. For the reason that the governor of the State of Delaware was waiting to see whether the Senate of the United States would admit the appointees of governors.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why did not Pennsylvania wait, then, like Delaware?

Mr. KENNEY. I am unable to answer that question. It might have been if Pennsylvania had not led, Delaware might have done so; but if the decision of this case was satisfactory to the governor of Delaware, and if the Senate should admit Mr. Quay, the Democratic governor of Delaware would give credentials to a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the legislature's failure to elect.

The sole and only remedy for such ills is that just and reasonable construction of the Constitution which will place in operation that other power provided by the makers of the Constitution for keeping the Senate filled—appointments by the governors to fill vacancies. Not until such a settlement of the question is had will there be certainty of the legal and constitutional existence and continuation of the Senate of the United States.

These are my convictions as to the construction of the Constitution on this question, and by reason of this opinion I shall vote against the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, so much learning, eloquence, and scholarship have been expended upon this debate that the Senate is wearied if not convinced. It would require genius of a high order to suggest anything new and oratory of the first magnitude to lend any charm to the hackneyed theme. Indeed, sir, if the angel Gabriel were to appear in the livery of heaven and speak with accents of angelic sweetness, it is doubted whether he could now change a vote on the Quay case.

The only way, sir, that I can justify the taking of a moment of the Senate's time is that it would be wise for a Senator now to state the exact ground upon which he places his vote. He may agree with the conclusions of the committee and not agree with all the arguments and contentions presented in support of its report, so that when the endless chain shall bring this same everlasting question before the next Congress he may be bound only by the conclusions of the committee that he supports.

If, sir, all precedents are to be swept away, every future case must be argued de novo, and in such a judicial medley where personal preference is to compete with constitutional conviction it may be difficult for a Senator to remain consistent with himself. Indeed, that is an accomplishment which has been denied to some of the Senators upon this floor.

This case is sui generis in at least two aspects: First, the vacancy occurred by expiration of a regular term and happened during a session of the legislature, which thereupon assumed jurisdiction to fill the same; secondly, the certificate of the governor was issued in violation of law. The certificate presented by Mr. Quay is bottomed upon the power of temporary appointment. The question here presented is essentially one of power, not of preference. Grant the power of the executive, and the right of personal selection belongs exclusively to him by the plain precept of the Constitution. The first proposition just announced will create a new precedent and disturb a long line of adjudication if Mr. Quay is seated. Never before has the certificate of any governor been recognized when the vacancy was anticipated and happened during a session and was then entertained by the legislature.

The whole contention rests upon the construction of a plain English sentence. We are called upon to construe a text, not to define a policy or to reward a friend. If we approach the task in a calm, judicial spirit, or, what is the same thing, with an honest purpose to deal fairly with familiar words, there should be no difficulty. There are no technical complications, because it is agreed that every word should be read in its usual popular sense.

The Convention having determined after great deliberation that the members of the Senate should be chosen by the legislature, further declared:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

"If vacancies happen during a recess." This language imposes a condition precedent. If, therefore, the Quay vacancy did not happen "during a recess" within the meaning of this clause, there was no authority for executive action. To the common mind there would seem to be no doubt or ambiguity about the meaning of this expression, "If vacancies happen." To demonstrate that there is no ambiguity lurking in the word "happen," substitute any of its synonyms—"occur," "take place," "come to pass"—and the meaning is not changed a particle. "If vacancies take place during a recess" relates to such vacancies as originate while the legislature is not in session and excludes all others.

To the common mind this sentence clearly conveys the meaning that the power to appoint depends upon the time when the vacancy begins. Vacancies falling within the period known as a recess are within the power and all others fall outside. English language can hardly be more plain, specific, or direct. There is no imperfection or flexibility in the language. I believe this obvious rendering is correct and conclusive. Illustration or argument can hardly elucidate so clear a proposition.

Authority to an inferior tribunal to admit to bail in all cases happening during a vacation, as distinguished from term time, would clearly indicate a jurisdiction limited by the time of occurrence. No man could mistake the obvious purpose. Authority to adjust all losses by fire that happen between two certain dates would clearly exclude all cases falling outside the period, and no man could go astray as to the meaning.

So the familiar provision in testamentary documents, that if the death of a certain legatee happen before the decease of the testator, such and such results shall follow, is so plain that in the multitude of cases of testamentary construction, so far as I know, no doubt has ever been intimated as to the meaning of the provision. No court has ever entertained any such doubt.

None should be tolerated here, "if vacancies happen during a recess." The Quay vacancy did not happen during a recess, but occurred on the 4th day of March, when the legislature was in session and promptly assumed jurisdiction to fill the same. My contention, therefore, is that the vacancy does not fall within the limited jurisdiction of the executive.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] called to our attention a new rendering of this clause and has directed my particular attention to it. I can see in it nothing but novelty and ingenuity, for both of which my distinguished friend is justly noted. I have never yet learned that any court applied any such rule of construction that you could take the same words and rearrange and reframe the sentence, for instance, expunge a condition precedent, as is clearly done by my friend's construction, and then maintain that that is a fair construction because you have put in the same words. That is contortion as distinguished from construction; and if I were called upon to define this system of construction, I would call it acrobatic. The learned Senator also pointed out how easy it is to find his contention in the sentence by simply changing three words and putting in three words that are not there. If I were called upon to define that system of construction, I would call it muscular and athletic.

But I am here at the very threshold of this discussion to insist that there can be no interpretation or construction. Have we not, after all, been losing sight of elementary principles that ought to be familiar to every lawyer? It is taken for granted in the argument that every Senator is at liberty to construe and allow his imagination and ingenuity full reign, but I stand here to invoke the first great rule of construction which Mr. Sedgwick justly puts at the very head of this discussion, namely, that where a sentence is plain and unambiguous, there can be no such thing as construction. In such a case interpretation becomes impertinence. When there is no imperfection or doubt in the language, construction degenerates into casuistry.

I have yet to hear any Senator on this floor point out any imperfection in that sentence; I have yet to hear any Senator point out any ambiguity in that sentence; and every word is familiar to a schoolboy, well understood, in its ordinary application conveying only one meaning; and I stand here to insist that it is not a case for construction, but is a case simply to apply that well-understood meaning to familiar words and deal with it in the same sense in which it was penned by the authors of the constitutional provision.

Construction offers a great temptation to genius. There is nothing that can not be mystified. No word or sentence is safe if subjected to the refinements of literary wizards and casuists. I remember as a schoolboy that the teacher would write on the blackboard the sentence "Jesus wept," and instruct us that it was the shortest sentence in the English language, but even that short, plain, pathetic sentence would not be safe among the Scribes and Pharisees of construction.

The law is well settled that there must be doubt to justify interpretation, and it must be a doubt that inheres in the language, not a doubt arising out of some supposed purpose of the lawmakers; not a doubt born of some preconceived wish, but there must be some imperfection or ambiguity in the very words employed. We must deal with the language of the text. We must gather the meaning from the words of the Convention. If they meant something that they did not say, there is no rule of construction that will help out the case. Let me refer to Mr. Story, not with the idea of citing an authority, because that would be mere pedantry in such a case, but for the purpose of adopting the felicitous language of two or three authorities, in order that we may come back to the common and fundamental ground of this question. Mr. Story, one of our greatest expounders of the law, thus states the proposition:

> What the legislative intent was can be derived from the words they used, and we can not speculate beyond the reasonable import of these words; the spirit of the act must be gathered from the words of the act and not from conjecture aliunde. If the language is clear and admits of but one meaning, there is no room for construction. Any departure from the language would be an unjustifiable assumption of legislative power.

This maxim holds good even in a case where the words employed fail to accomplish the legislative purpose.

Courts are not to tamper with the clear and unequivocal meaning of words used, although the consequences may not be such as were contemplated by the legislature. There can be no departure from the plain meaning of the statute on grounds of unwisdom or public policy.

It would be pedantry to cite authority upon so elementary a proposition, but I wish to adopt the expression of the court. The supreme court of Ohio, in Woodbury vs. Berry (18 Ohio State, 462), said:

But, notwithstanding all this ita lex scripta, the language as it stands is clear, explicit, and unequivocal. It leaves no room for interpretation, for nothing in the language is doubtful. We are satisfied by considerations outside of the language that the legislature intended to enact something very different from what it did enact, but it did not carry out its intention, and we can not take the will for the deed. It is our legitimate function to interpret legislation, but not to supply omissions. (23 Am. and Eng. Encyc., 301.)

I am not aware that any Senator has been able to point out any defect or ambiguity in this simple passage.

Great stress has been laid upon the proposition that the purpose was to keep the Senate full and that this legislative purpose would warrant great latitude of construction. Undoubtedly it is a canon of interpretation that the legislative purpose and the object aimed at are to be borne in mind, and if language fairly admits of two renderings, it is to receive that construction which will bring it into harmony with such purpose; but, as one authority lays it down, "To justify a departure from the literal meaning of the words, the intention must appear with reasonable certainty, for where the words plainly express the intent, the construction must be in accord therewith."

As we have shown, this passage limits the power of the governor to a single class of vacancies, viz, those which occur during a recess. It is argued that there appears to be no good reason why all vacancies might not have been intrusted to the same appointing power. But the law excludes this argument entirely. To quote from an acknowledged authority:

Words may not be imported into a statute in order that it may include a case which has been omitted merely because there seems to be no good reason why it should have been omitted and the omission therefore seems to have been unintentional.

Now, what is it that the minority report seeks to do with this plain, unambiguous sentence? To write in two words that are not there. The words "to exist" are inserted after the word "happen," so that the same shall read: "If vacancies happen to exist during a recess," etc. That is to say, the verb "happen" is to bear the meaning of continued existence. This is exactly opposite to its usual, ordinary signification. This is doing violence to the word and hence to the rule. This is an example of the muscular, athletic style of construction. Happen has a shade of meaning which its synonyms do not express—casualty, accident, fortuitous occurrence—all of which tend to limit it to the moment or precise time of occurrence. A vacancy may continue for months, but it can happen but once, and that is at the time when it originates.

The men who wrote the Constitution were masters of style and were exact in their use of language. I doubt if there is another legal document in the English language where words have been chosen with greater felicity or precision. If they sought to express the idea of continued existence, it is inconceivable that they would have hit upon so unsuitable a word as "happen." A careful reading of the whole provision will satisfy any candid man that the theory of the minority report is an afterthought—an effort to stretch the Constitution so as to embrace a casus omissus. It perhaps might well have been embraced within the provision; it might have been wiser to have inserted it; but that does not help the contention of the majority as matter of law.

The power of selecting members of the upper House was justly regarded as a high prerogative, as the debates abundantly show. There was every reason to suppose that the legislature would be eager to exercise this great function in every proper case, for the love of power is born in every human heart. Besides, the legislature, being responsible for the representation of its State in the Senate, would have the strongest incentive, as well as inclination, to take prompt action to fill all Senatorial vacancies.

This was undoubtedly the view taken by the Convention. They did not foresee the deadlock and deviltry and intrigue that would eventually put their scheme to the test, but considered that they had made suitable and safe provision for the filling of all vacancies. But one emergency was foreseen which the legislature would be powerless to meet, namely, vacancies occurring when the legislature was not in session. Therefore, it was deemed wise in such cases to provide for a temporary appointment by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Hence the provision, "If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess."

It was not within their contemplation that the legislature would fail to do its duty. In all the lengthy debates no such suggestion anywhere appears. Therefore, there was no expectation that a vacancy happening in one recess, or during a meeting, would survive the session and be carried over into the next recess. Having provided for the only case which was beyond the reach of the legislature, they supposed they had covered the ground. It will be noticed that the tenure of the appointee was limited to the next meeting of the legislature, "which shall then fill such vacancies," showing again the utmost confidence that the vacancy would be promptly filled when the legislature should convene.

As a programme on paper there was nothing more to be desired. The scheme was perfect and complete. The prime difficulty with the minority report is that it seeks to construe this provision by the light of a century of actual experience. If we would truly catch the meaning of the Convention we must adopt its point of view. The scheme of government being framed was entirely new and untried. It would be singular, indeed, if actual experience during a hundred years of political activity should not reveal some weakness in the scheme and suggest some manifest amendment. But let it be remembered that we are not commissioned to amend, but have only the plain duty to read the text as it was understood by the men who penned it. In my humble judgment the case in hand does not fall within the authority of the executive, and his certificate is not entitled to recognition.

The second proposition, which is peculiar to this case, is that the appointment of Mr. Quay was made in contravention of law. Up to this time in this discussion it has been assumed, sub silentio, that the provision of the Pennsylvania constitution for frequent sessions of the legislature to fill Senatorial vacancies was wholly a State regulation and that the disobedience of the governor was exclusively a matter of State concern that had no logical or legitimate bearing upon the case now before the Senate. The militant attitude of the governor has been referred to as a consideration having remote application and entitled to certain moral influence only when serious doubt exists as to the matter of strict legal right.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to the claim that this local constitutional regulation has to respect and enforcement here. This provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania was inserted in 1874, and reads as follows:

In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth, in a recess between sessions, the governor shall convene the two houses, by proclamation, on notice not exceeding sixty days, to fill the same.

The appointment made by the governor of Pennsylvania has raised a sharp issue with the organic law of his State. He is claiming, under the Constitution of the United States—and I think we shall find that the State regulations for filling vacancies in the upper House of Congress arose out of Federal necessity and are bottomed upon Federal authority—that they are not to be ignored in this debate nor brushed aside at the will of a State officer.

Our dual system of government is complex. The doctrine of the Trinity has always perplexed theologians, but our political scheme involves, not three in one, but forty-five in one. Forty-five separate States, embraced by one National Union, each sovereign within its peculiar sphere, and yet each in some measure dependent upon the other, constituting not a mere compact of States, but a great nation. Foreign jurists view with amazement the successful operation of this complicated system. Yet so harmonious is its working that our own people hardly appreciate its intricacies, for the same reason that their attention is not arrested by the complex wonders of the planetary system. By the very framework of our National Union certain of the machinery must be under the joint operation of States and nation.

In many instances the central Government must have the cooperation of State laws and State officers. Mr. Brice, in his American Commonwealth, speaking of the Federal Constitution, says:

It is, so to speak, the complement and crown of the State constitutions, which must be read along with it and into it in order to make it cover the whole field of civil government.

The permanence of the National Government depends upon the regular selection by the States of Members and Senators. The failure to discharge this function would cripple the Union by depriving it of its legislative department. No scheme of supplying the Federal Legislature was practicable that ignored the States, and again, no plan was tolerable that awarded to the States exclusive control of a function so vital to the very existence of the Union.

All this was foreseen by the wise men who framed our Constitution. By section 2, Article I, they provided:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every two years by the people of the several States.

By section 3:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, to be chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years, etc.

Her contribution has been laid upon the people of the States in the one case and upon the legislatures of the States in the other. This is one of the instances where power is directly conferred by the Constitution upon the several States. The States have no other warrant for the exercise of this authority, and the grant is primarily in the interest of the Federal Government.

By section 4, Article I, it is provided:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Having by the preceding sections adopted the States as instrumentalities of the General Government to furnish suitable representation to keep the Federal Government supplied, the States are, by section 4, clothed with certain discretion to employ their own election machinery, which, for this important function, is adopted as a Federal agency. Times, places, and methods of conducting elections are also left to the convenience of the several States.

If the Convention had stopped there the majority of the States might, by concerted action, have brought the Federal machinery to a full stop. While such a contingency was not probable, it was a possibility against which wise statesmanship was bound to provide. Therefore another provision in the nature of a check was thought necessary and was appended to section 4, as follows:

But the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulation except as to the places of choosing Senators.

By the adoption of this Constitution the several States surrendered their sovereignty to this extent, that the General Government might have supervisory control over the whole subject of selecting members of the National Legislature. They virtually tendered to the Union the use of their legislative and executive machinery so far as was necessary to subserve this Federal purpose. Thus was provided an admirable system of checks and balances, alike creditable to both State and nation.

As we have seen, Federal supremacy was indispensable, for whenever the General Government is empowered to act at all it must be supreme. As Chief Justice Marshall expressed it:

The General Government, though limited as to its objects, is supreme with respect to those objects.

During the discussions that followed the work of the Convention this section was viciously attacked as an encroachment upon the rights of the States. It was vigorously defended by Mr. Hamilton in the Federalist. He says:

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation. * * * Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of State legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy.—Dawson's Edition, page 411.

Under the last clause of section 4 Congress has undoubted power to make complete regulations as to time and manner of elections, and thus to displace all local regulations heretofore made, or it may alter such State regulations. This involves the power to approve in part and reject in part existing provisions, and to adopt as the Federal rule such altered regulations. It also implies the power to adopt without change the regulation made by the State, in which event it becomes a constituent part of the Federal plan of regulation.

As is well known, Congress has several times exercised this power. It has superseded State regulations, so as to secure uniform elections of members of Congress. It has also regulated the manner of procedure in elections of United States Senators. (14 Stats., 243.)

Congress has never found it necessary to exhaust its power by dictating to the States the time when Senatorial vacancies should be filled. It may seem startling, at first blush, that Congress may prescribe to the States the time when legislatures shall convene, but a reference to the debates will dispel all doubt that this is exactly what the Convention intended and insisted upon in so far as might be necessary to insure elections of members of the second House.

When this section was under consideration in the Convention, it was moved to confine this language to the House of Representatives, being of opinion that as to the Senators the right of the legislature to regulate was necessarily involved in the right to appoint—you see that raised the exact question—but the motion was disagreed to. (Growth of Constitution, page 88.) Later on, Pinckney and Rutledge moved to strike out the clause allowing Congress to regulate the election of Senators, on the ground "that the States should be relied upon."

Gorham, King, Madison, and Gouverneur Morris were all of the contrary opinion. Madison said that the words authorizing the States to regulate were words of great latitude and it was impossible to see what abuse might be made of such discretion. The motion of Pinckney and Rutledge was defeated, and the text was made to read:

But regulation in each of the foregoing cases may, at any time, be made or altered by the Legislature of the United States.

This was referred to the committee on style, and was reported and adopted as we now find it in the text.

It requires but a moment's reflection to catch the force of Madison's warning. Suppose a number of States should conspire to embarrass the National Government. They might pass laws providing for meetings of their legislatures once in five years, and without the reservation in section 4 the National Government would have been completely at the mercy of the States.

This section has been construed by the Supreme Court as investing Congress with plenary supervision over the entire subject, save only as to the places where the legislature shall meet.

The power of Congress, under the Constitution, to provide the time for legislative action on Senatorial vacancies can not be doubted. It would be competent for Congress to enact the very provision that Pennsylvania has put in its constitution, practically requiring all vacancies to be promptly filled by the legislature.

As the law now stands, existing regulations of Senatorial elections have been furnished partly by the States and partly by Congress. These must be read together, because together they constitute a single system of supervision and control.

By the act of 1866 Congress has provided for the manner of procedure in three cases:

First. When a vacancy is anticipated.

Secondly. When a vacancy exists when the legislature meets.

Thirdly. When a vacancy happens during the session.

The constitution of Pennsylvania has undertaken to provide for the filling of vacancies existing during a recess of the legislature, and thus the entire field is covered.

In contemplation of law Congress thus adopted as its own any State regulation as to time and manner that it has not seen fit to alter. This doctrine is well illustrated by the Supreme Court in Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., 371). This was a case of habeas corpus issued out of the United States Supreme Court to test the legality of the conviction of certain State officers who served as inspectors of election in Maryland under State laws at an election of members of Congress. Bear in mind the people indicted those State officers. They were serving under State laws, and the Government of the United States undertook to indict those State officers for a violation of their own State laws. The United States court had entertained jurisdiction under section 5515 of the Revised Statutes, imposing penalties for any violation of official duty in connection with such elections. A conviction resulted under a Federal indictment. The theory upon which the conviction was sustained by the Supreme Court was that although the regulations were made by the State to control the election of members of Congress they had been virtually adopted and become a part of the Federal scheme, so that the infraction might be punished as an offense against the laws of the United States. Not having been altered by Congress, and Congress having complete supervisory power over the subject, such State regulations had the force and effect of Congressional enactments.

I quote from the language of the opinion (pages 387–388):

It is objected that Congress has no power to punish State officers, and especially has no power to punish them for violating the laws of their own State. As a general proposition, this is undoubtedly true; but, when in the performance of their functions State officers are called upon to fulfill duties which they owe to the United States as well as to the State, has the former no means of compelling such fulfillment? Yet that is the case here. It is the duty of the States to elect representatives to Congress. The due and fair election of these representatives is of vital importance to the United States. The Government of the United States is no less concerned in the transaction than the State government is. It certainly is not bound to stand by as a passive spectator when duties are violated and outrageous frauds are committed. It is directly interested in the faithful performance by the officers of election of their respective duties.

These duties are owed as well to the United States as to the State, this necessarily following from the mixed character of the transaction—State and national. * * *

The State laws that Congress sees no occasion to alter, but which it allows to stand, are in effect adopted by Congress. (Page 388.)

The authority of this case has been repeatedly reaffirmed by the Supreme Court. (Ex parte Clark, 100 U. S., 399; United States vs. Gale, 109 U. S., 65; Ex parte Yarborough, 110 U. S.)

Applying this reasoning to the same provision so far as it relates to the election of Senators, and the Pennsylvania regulation for frequent sessions becomes a constituent part of the Federal scheme of regulation, and is entitled to be regarded as of the same virtue as though expressly enacted by Congress. It would be destructive of all harmonious action and would impeach the wisdom of Federal supervision if it were otherwise.

Thus these two constitutions sustain to each other in this joint scheme much the same relation as two cogwheels which are operating together for the purpose of transmitting power. In this case it is a Federal power that by this joint contrivance is distributed to the State machinery. Recurring now to the cogwheels, if you insert a lever and stop either wheel, the whole machine is paralyzed.

So the Federal Government, which is intrusted with the supervision and control of the entire scheme, must protect that portion of the apparatus furnished by the States, because it is an integral part and a necessary adjunct of the electoral machinery.

Now, suppose the very language of the Pennsylvania constitution had been employed by act of Congress in making regulations for such election and the governor of Pennsylvania had openly defied such law by refusing to issue his proclamation and had assumed to make a temporary appointment. How many Senators on this floor would vote to seat his nominee and so deprive the legislature of its lawful function?

Congress is concerned in the integrity of the whole scheme over which it presides and for which it is responsible, and the provision that the legislature of Pennsylvania shall be convened to fill all Senatorial vacancies is a part of it. The provision in question was adopted in 1874, and is as follows:

Section 4, Article II. In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this Commonwealth in a recess between sessions the governor shall convene the two houses by proclamation, on notice not exceeding sixty days, to fill the same.

If I have demonstrated that Congress has control over this whole subject, then it follows that Congress is under the same obligation to enforce the State regulation that it adopts as it is to alter or reject such as it disapproves.

This Pennsylvania regulation is in exact accord with the spirit of the Constitution. The Convention, after mature deliberation, determined that Senators should be chosen by the legislature and that this power should not be intrusted to any other body or tribunal, nor yet to the people. Whenever, therefore, an opportunity is afforded for the legislature to fill a vacancy, the purpose of the Constitution and the best interests of the Union are promoted.

The vice of the minority, and I may say, Mr. President, the surprising inaccuracy of the statement made upon this floor, is that the power of temporary appointment is considered as equal to the filling of the vacancy. Several times to-day the expression has escaped the lips of Senators here that the governor fills the vacancy, and the power of temporary appointment is practically recognized as equivalent, if not superior, to the function delegated to the legislature. If adopted by the Senate, the legislature is practically subordinated to the governor. The power of temporary appointment is secondary in its nature and can never rise to the level of the legislative prerogative. It can never become an equivalent for the power to fill a vacancy. The vacancy is placed beyond executive control. The power conferred on the governor is a mere temporary expedient provided to meet a case where the legislature can not act, because it can not act, and to terminate as soon as legislative action can be secured. It was a makeshift, designed to meet an emergency happening in a recess, and was to expire with the recess—"until the next meeting of the legislature" is the language.

There was no thought that it could obstruct or prevent a meeting of the legislature. It was intended to supplement, not to supplant, legislative function. Whenever and as often as the legislature has a legal opportunity to assemble it is entitled to plenary jurisdiction of the vacancy, and the temporary expedient, being unnecessary, wholly disappears. Cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex.

Now, what has the governor of Pennsylvania done?

At a time when provision had been made under Federal sanction, as I have shown, for a meeting of the legislature to fill this vacancy, when, to use the language of the Constitution, "the next meeting of the legislature" was ready to assemble, and only awaited his proclamation, when there was no excuse for a temporary appointment, he seizes upon this pretext and literally usurps the prerogative of the legislature. This he does in order that he may increase his own patronage and perpetuate his own favorite. Mr. President, such conduct is not only unconstitutional, but it is revolutionary. It ought to be condemned by every law-abiding man, either in or out of the Senate.

But it is said that the law of Pennsylvania can not override the Constitution, whereby the governor is clothed with the right to appoint. Mr. President, there is no conflict of law, as we have shown. There can be no temporary appointment except for the purposes and within the limits fixed by the Constitution.

Suppose the legislature of Pennsylvania determined to have continuous sessions, as it has a clear right to do. In that event every vacancy in the Senate could be filled without delay. What would become of the power of temporary appointment? Of course it would be unnecessary and barren. The conditions would not arise to warrant its exercise. In such a case would there be any conflict of law or any impairment of executive prerogative? The governor has no vested right in this appointment as against the legislature of his State, yet that is practically what you are holding by recognizing this certificate.

Let me revert again to the Constitution to better illustrate the functions that the State is compelled to discharge to aid in the operation of the Federal scheme. By clause 4, section 2, of Article I, it is provided, "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Here the Constitution lays its injunction directly upon a State officer to accomplish a Federal purpose. It does not undertake to dictate the form of the writ or the local procedure. That is left to the State authority. But every subordinate State officer concerned in executing the mandate is for that purpose and to that extent an instrumentality of the National Government.

Now, in the case of Senatorial, elections the Constitution has adopted a different formula. Instead of ordering the executive to call sessions of the legislature to fill vacancies, it has authorized the States to convene the legislature at such times as they may select. Pursuant to this authority the people of Pennsylvania have issued the order to the executive to convene the legislature to fill every vacancy as the same occurs. Is not the edict of the State under these circumstances entitled to the same respect here as though directly proclaimed on Federal authority?

I assert that the major proposition in debate is not that the Senate be kept full, but that the machinery of the Constitution shall not be broken down; that the legislature shall not be despoiled by executive assumption; that the Senate shall not be kept full by revolutionary means and unlawful procedure; that the temporary expedient shall not survive the emergency for which it was provided and to which its exercise was restricted.

But, sir, for the purposes of the argument, suppose that my contention is unsound that the State regulations of Federal elections are of the same dignity and consequence as Federal regulations because adopted into the Federal system. It must be proved that they are entitled to recognition and respect at the hands of Federal authorities.

We have seen that the States are, in this regard, exercising Federal power to accomplish a Federal purpose. Our Constitution virtually commands the States, in the interest of the Union, to supply membership for the upper House. It places the supervision of the whole subject upon Congress. Our Government has practically said to the States, in view of the great inconvenience and expense involved and because of varied conditions in the several States, We will not insist upon extra sessions to fill all Senatorial vacancies as they occur. We have arranged for a temporary appointment until your legislature can conveniently meet, and we leave the details to you. Are we to be told that Congress is to remain indifferent as to how and whether the States execute this power, and that a State statute which embodies this authority is to be regarded as purely a matter of local concern? What then becomes of the control that Congress is required to exercise over this whole matter?

Now, what response did the State of Pennsylvania make to the Federal suggestion? With great loyalty and patriotism she inserted in her constitution, where it was beyond the reach of the legislature, a provision which reaches the utmost limit of Federal requirement. She tenders to the United States the use of her legislative machinery as often and as soon as a vacancy happens in the Senate, providing only for a notice of sixty days. This generous attitude is characteristic of that magnificent Commonwealth that has never failed and never flinched in her fidelity to the Union.

Now, it is seriously proposed that this Government, through its Senate, shall exercise its supervisory power by confederating with an obstructionist to overthrow the constitution and spurn the generous overtures of the State made for our benefit and at our instance.

What greater indignity or humiliation could be inflicted upon a great State?

For, remember, Mr. President, this is a far-reaching proposition. It is not limited, in its pernicious consequences, to the Quay vacancy—but silences the sovereign behest of that great State forever.

What Governor Stone has done his successors may do, and when this Senate has once fixed the seal of its approval it will require less hardihood on the part of succeeding governors. There will be the pretext of example added to the temptations of interest. Thus the power of temporary appointment will swell the regular patronage of the executive office, and the constitution of Pennsylvania will forever remain a dead letter. Mr. President, I have no right to speak for this great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and shall not assume to do so. Her honor is not committed to my keeping; but, representing in part another State upon this floor, I am not willing to join in the assault upon her constitution. Nor will I vote to approve a certificate which is to all intents and purposes a letter of marque and reprisal against the organic law of a sister State.

No reasonable man can doubt that the plan of the Pennsylvania constitution, if it could be generally adopted, would be highly beneficial to the General Government. The proper way to keep the Senate full is to fill the vacancies.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] enriched his scholarly address here the other day by a reference to the laws of nature. "Nature abhors a vacuum," and, according to his views, a vacancy here was in like manner abhorrent. It seems to me that his illustration was singularly unsuited to his logic. His whole argument was in advocacy of a continuing vacancy, which a temporary appointment can never fill. He declines to consent that the vacancy shall be filled when appropriate means are at hand, but insists upon keeping open the aching void

Mr. President, on Saturday the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] was speaking about the experiences of his State and was congratulating the Senate and himself and the country upon the successful conduct of the legislature of his State. He spoke highly of the distinguished gentleman who has been brought here as his colleague. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], an acute and able man, thought he saw that that suggestion from the Senator from California was not advancing his contention; and so, in quite dramatic style, you remember, he interrupted the Senator from California and desired to know whether the governor of California did not receive some assurances from the members of the legislature that influenced him to call that extra session.

The effort was to differentiate the State of California from the State of Pennsylvania; and why should he not? Because, Mr. President, right on this floor we see the fruits of the two systems; we see California with her representation full; we see two able men representing that great Commonwealth—the fruit of the policy of the Constitution which was pursued by the governor of California. What is the fruit of the other policy pursued in Pennsylvania? It is this miserable contest, which is obstructing the public business, and which is deplorable in its every aspect. No wonder the Senator from Pennsylvania should wish to differentiate the two.

What was the reply of the distinguished Senator from California? Why, he thought that there had been a rumor of some such assurance, but what the assurance was he could not tell. I inferred, after the debate was over, that some members of the legislature of California had whispered in the ear of the governor, and he therefore called the legislature. But I would submit to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania that upon an equally credible rumor I suggest that somebody whispered in the ear of the governor of Pennsylvania, who thereupon declined to call the legislature together; and we will let the two whispers stand one over against the other and proceed to settle this great question on some higher plane than mere stage whispers.

But we are told upon this floor that local political conditions were such as to justify a disregard of the constitution; that another session of the legislature would have been barren of results, and therefore the governor was warranted in nullifying the organic law. This is the specious plea of every man who finds it convenient to break the law. This strips the law of its sanctity. Constitutions are made to be obeyed by governors as well as by other men. Laws become a mockery if they may be broken as often as the lawbreaker decides that no good purpose would be subserved by their observance.

The poor wretch who steals a loaf is not permitted to explain that the crime was necessary to preserve the life of his children and worked no actual hardship to the lawful owner. His eyes are dazzled by the gleaming radiance of the law, and he is hustled off to jail. But larceny too often becomes respectable when it becomes great. Under this sentimental view a crime may assume magnificent proportions and challenge admiration. A high officer who robs a legislature of its prerogative and appropriates it to his own use may escape condemnation by arguing that it would have done no good to follow the mandate of the law, and that by taking the constitution by the throat he has subserved the public weal.

This Chamber is the place where law should be sacred for its own sake, and where such a lame and impotent excuse should not pass current.

Therefore, Mr. President, whether we consult the plain precept of the Constitution or the vital interests of our Government; whether we consider the deference due to the great State of Pennsylvania or the integrity of a joint system of regulation over which Congress presides, or whether we contemplate the threatened calamity, the loss of all our precedents for a hundred years, we are as matter of law and duty bound, no matter with how much of personal regret, to deny a seat in this body to Mr. Quay until he receives the indorsement of his legislature.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. It is suggested to me by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that if the Senator from Kentucky is willing to yield, I may address the Senate briefly. I will ask the Senator to do so, if it suits his convenience.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course I will do anything that is agreeable——

Mr. PENROSE. The suggestion comes entirely from the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn today it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, while I am willing to proceed with the brief remarks which I have prepared upon the Quay case, I will state that I am perfectly willing to consult the convenience of the Senate and the wishes of the Senators here present, either by proceeding now or going on to-morrow morning. If, however, it is the wish of the Senate that I should proceed at this time, I will do so. I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I intended to move an adjournment, but a number of Senators are opposed to the motion, and so I shall not make it.

Mr. HALE. Instead of adjourning, I desire at a later hour a short executive session, to confirm a very important appointment; but I shall not interfere with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senator if he would not rather finish his speech to-morrow morning, when there will be a larger attendance in the Senate?

Mr. PENROSE. I am perfectly willing to have the Senate adjourn if it is so desired.

[Mr. PENROSE'S speech will be found entire in the RECORD of April 24.]

Mr. SEWELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator to substitute for that motion a motion for an executive session.

Mr. SEWELL. I will then move an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 24, 1900, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 23, 1900.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Frank W. Hackett, of New Hampshire, to be Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

PROMOTION IN THE ARMY.

Artillery arm.

First Lieut. Samuel D. Sturgis, Sixth Artillery, to be captain, April 8, 1900.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 23, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ELLIOTT for one week.

BUSINESS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMITTEE.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Monday be substituted for to-day for the consideration of business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that next Monday be substituted for this day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NICARAGUAN CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday and Wednesday of next week—May 1 and 2—be set apart for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2538, a bill which provides for the construction of a canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, making the consideration of the bill a special order for the days in question immediately after the approval of the Journal.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to object to the request of my friend from Iowa, but I think we have a special order already set apart for Monday—the free-home bill.

Mr. PAYNE. No; the gentleman is mistaken. That is set for the 3d.

Mr. McRAE. I find I was mistaken, Mr. Speaker. I make no objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I desire to submit an inquiry. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa how much time is to be devoted to the consideration of the bill in the general debate?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I thought that in all possibility we would be enabled to dispose of the general debate on the first day, and that on the second day, when the bill is before the House, we might consider and dispose of it by sections under the five-minute rule for debate and amendment. I want to get a vote on Wednesday and dispose of the matter at that time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have taken the trouble, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, to submit a minority report on the bill, and if there is some understanding for the time to be allowed for discussion—that is, as to how much time on the minority side may be allowed—I shall not object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course I can not tell anything about that. I do not know now what opposition will be developed during the discussion, but I want to be absolutely fair about it, and I have no doubt that we may arrive at a satisfactory arrangement as to the distribution of time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. With the understanding, Mr. Speaker, that we may have one-half of the time provided for the consideration of the bill, I will not object.

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly; I can have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa, and the order is accordingly made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4168. An act to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of site and erection of a building thereon at Leadville, Colo.;

S. 3436. An act granting a pension to Catharine Weinheimer;

S. 2610. An act to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery, in the city of Washington, D. C.;

S. 2572. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.," approved February 21, 1899.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2572. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Newport News, Va.," approved February 21, 1899—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 2610. An act to authorize the purchase of the property known as the Corcoran Art Gallery, in the city of Washington, D. C.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 3436. An act granting a pension to Catharine Weinheimer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4168. An act to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of site and erection of a building thereon at Leadville, Colo.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FORT BUFORD ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9496) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Buford abandoned military reservation, in the States of North Dakota and Montana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands now remaining undisposed of within the abandoned military reservation in the States of North Dakota and Montana, formerly known as Fort Buford Military Reservation, and which are not otherwise occupied or used for any public purpose, are hereby made subject to disposal under the homestead, town-site, and desert-land laws: Provided, That actual occupants thereon upon the 1st day of January, 1900, if otherwise qualified, shall have the preference right to make one entry not exceeding one quarter section: Provided further, That any of such lands as are occupied for town-site purposes, and any of the lands that may be shown to be valuable for coal or minerals, such lands so occupied for town-site purposes or valuable for coal or minerals shall be disposed of as now provided for lands subject to entry and sale under the town-site, coal, or mineral-land laws, respectively: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision may include adjoining lands to the amount of 160 acres, on which any buildings or improvements of the United States are situated, but such lands shall be appraised and sold as now provided by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McRAE. Before consent is given, I should like to know the size of this reservation and its character.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I will say that this is an abandoned military reservation in the semiarid region at the junction of the Yellowstone River with the Missouri. There are about 500,000 acres of it, and there is probably one-third to one-half of it that is available for agricultural purposes, the balance being untillable bluffs and bottom lands covered with brush, on the Missouri and Yellowstone rivers. The value of it is so little as to make it undesirable for entry under the McRae Act; but there are settlers going into that country who desire to take up such portions of it as are suited for agricultural purposes.

Mr. McRAE. Why can they not do it under existing law?

Mr. SPALDING. The buildings on it have been sold by the Government, so that there are supposed to be no improvements on it; but in case there should be a few buildings left, a proviso has been inserted that the act shall not apply to any subdivision of land which may include adjoining lands to the amount of 160 acres on which any Government buildings or improvements may remain, but that such lands shall be appraised and sold as provided by law.

Mr. McRAE. Why can not the settlers take the land under existing law?

Mr. SPALDING. Because it is not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre on an average. This bill is reported unanimously from the committee and has the indorsement of the Land Department.

Mr. McRAE. The law does not require land to be worth a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. SPALDING. The minimum price at which it can be sold under existing law is $1.25 per acre, as I understand the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if there is any formal letter here from the Department or bureau recommending this legislation?

Mr. SPALDING. There is a letter which is in possession of the committee, giving the status of the title to this land; but the letter which the Department wrote, the contents of which I have been informed of, was sent to the Senate and is now there. Commissioner Hermann told me that they recommended the enactment of this bill into law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURT, BILOXI, MISS.

Mr. McLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6868) to amend an act authorizing the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi to be held hereafter at Biloxi.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of chapter 351 of the United States Statutes at Large, entitled "An act authorizing the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi to be held hereafter at Biloxi," approved March 2, 1839, be amended as follows, to wit: After the words "district court" insert the words "and circuit court."

SEC. 2. That this act take effect from and after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McLAIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS RAINY LAKE, MINNESOTA.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7945) to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the building of a dam across Rainy Lake River."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act permitting the building of a dam across Rainy Lake River," approved May 3, 1898, and granting to the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, the consent of Congress to construct a dam across the Rainy Lake River, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized shall be completed within five years after the 3d day of May, 1898."

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 5, strike out "third" and insert "fourth."

Line 11, after the word "be," insert the words "commenced within three years and."

Line 12, strike out "third" and insert "fourth."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Do you in any way relieve the builders of this improvement from putting in fish ways?

Mr. FLETCHER. No, sir; it is simply an extension of the time for one year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the other bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

NEW ORLEANS AND NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8962) to authorize the New Orleans and Northwestern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to build and maintain a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, in the State of Louisiana.

The bill and the amendments recommended by the committee were read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RANSDELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT AT NEWBERN AND ELIZABETH CITY, N. C.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5296) establishing terms of the United States circuit court at Newbern and Elizabeth City, N. C.

Be it enacted, etc., That terms of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern judicial district of North Carolina shall be held at Newbern and Elizabeth City, in said district, at the times fixed by law for holding the terms of the district court of the United States at said places, Newbern and Elizabeth City.

SEC. 2. That the deputy clerks of the United States district courts at Newbern and Elizabeth City shall act as deputy clerks of the circuit court herein provided for unless the circuit judge and the district judge of said eastern district of North Carolina shall appoint deputy clerks of the circuit court for said terms, and said deputy clerks shall be responsible upon their bonds as deputy clerks of the district court for any malfeasance, nonfeasance, or misfeasance in office.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Insert the word "now" between the words "times and fixed," in line 5, section 1, of the bill.

Strike out section 2 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BONDS FOR WATERWORKS, TUCSON, ARIZ.

Mr. WILSON of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4468) to authorize the city of Tucson, Ariz., to issue bonds for waterworks, and for other purposes.

Whereas the mayor and common council of the city of Tucson, Ariz., acting under the authority of the act of Congress entitled "An act to amend an act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories, to limit Territorial indebtedness, etc.," approved March 4, 1898, caused an election to be held in the city of Tucson on the 5th day of May, 1898, on the question of issuance of $100,000 fifty-year 5 per cent interest-bearing bonds of the said city of Tucson for the construction of a water and sewerage system in the said city, and notice of said election was duly given as prescribed in the said act of Congress, and at said election more than two-thirds of the voters qualified as in the said act of Congress prescribed voted for the issuance of the said bonds; and

Whereas afterwards the said city of Tucson appointed a water and sewerage commission to investigate the question of water supply and waterworks for said city, and the said commission recommended to the said mayor and common council the purchase of the existing water plant instead of the construction of a wholly new plant for said city, and the mayor and common council thereupon and after consideration voted to purchase such existing water plant and to issue the said $100,000 of bonds for that purpose: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the mayor and common council of the city of Tucson, Ariz., be, and they are hereby, authorized, upon the passage of an ordinance or resolution to that effect, to issue $100,000 fifty-year 5 per cent interest-bearing bonds of said city for the purchase for said city of the existing water plant which supplies the said city and its inhabitants with water. Said bonds may be made payable in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard weight and fineness. Said bonds shall be in such form and denominations, and payable at such time and place, and interest thereon shall be payable annually or semiannually, as the mayor and common council of said city shall provide in said ordinance or resolution. Said bonds shall be signed by the mayor, have the corporate seal of the city affixed, attested by the city recorder, and the coupons may bear the engraved or lithographed signatures of the mayor and recorder, or be signed by them in person. The purchaser of the said bonds shall not be bound to see to the application of the purchase money. The said $100,000 of bonds may be issued in whole or in part payment for said existing water plant, and the city may, in addition to such bonds, assume as part of the purchase money of any water plant so purchased any mortgage existing thereon, not exceeding in amount the sum of $10,000, and may provide for the payment of the same by the issue of like bonds of the city, or in such other manner as the mayor and common council shall by ordinance or resolution determine.

SEC. 2. That the mayor and common council of said city of Tucson are hereby required and directed to levy and collect, in addition to all other taxes in said city, an ad valorem tax upon all the taxable property in said city sufficient to pay the interest on the said bonds as the same becomes due, and also at or before the time when the principal of the said bonds becomes due, a further ad valorem tax upon all the taxable property in said city sufficient to pay the same or to provide for the payment thereof. Such taxes shall be levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner as other taxes upon the property in said city. But the city may use and apply the net revenues of the water plant to pay interest on the bonds issued under this act, and to the extent that such revenues are actually so used and applied may omit the levy and collection of said tax, or the city may use such net revenues or any part thereof for the extension of said water plant.

SEC. 3. That the mayor and common council of the said city are hereby authorized to operate, manage, and control the said waterworks so authorized to be purchased, and for this purpose to appoint such agents, servants, and employees as they may deem proper, and to pay the same out of the revenues from the said waterworks or from any other revenues of the said city not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts, general and special, so far as they are in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed, and no proceedings for the issue of the bonds in this act authorized or for the assumption of the mortgage debt in this act authorized shall be necessary other than those in this act provided for.

Insert, after the word "thereon," in line 7, page 3, the words "not exceeding in amount the sum of $10,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR CANALS AND DITCHES.

Mr. DE VRIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10225) relating to rights of way for canals and ditches used for irrigation and other beneficial uses.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of sections 18 to 21, inclusive, of the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber culture laws, and for other purposes," are hereby extended and made applicable to rights of way through the public lands, parks, and reservations of the United States for canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, electric poles, lines, and plants, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits, dams, and reservoirs used to promote irrigation, mining, manufacturing, the generation and distribution of electric power, and supplying water for domestic, public, or any other beneficial use. Such rights of way may be obtained by individuals, associations, or corporations where it is intended to use the water for any one or more of the purposes herein named, and any right of way heretofore obtained for a canal or ditch under said act of March 3, 1891, or the act of January 21, 1895, appearing in 28 Statutes at Large, at page 635, or the act of May 14, 1896, appearing in 29 Statutes at Large, at page 120, or the act of May 11, 1898, appearing in 30 Statutes at Large, at page 404, may be used to convey water for any one or more of said purposes: Provided, That no such right of way shall be located within or through any park, forest, military, Indian, or other reservation, except upon the express approval of the chief officer of the department or bureau under whose supervision such park or reservation falls, and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interests.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Amend the title by striking out the words "for canals and ditches used for irrigation and other beneficial uses" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "through parks, reservations, and other public lands."

Strike out of line 9, page 1, the words "electric poles, lines, and."

Strike out of lines 11 and 12, page 1, the words "the generation and distribution of electric power," and insert after the word "use," in line 13, page 1, the words "and for electric plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electric power, and for telephone and telegraph purposes."

Strike out of line 12, page 2, the word "no," and insert after the word "shall," line 13, same page, the word "only."

Strike out of line 14, same page, the word "except," and out of line 15, same page, the word "express," and add, after the word "interests," in line 18, same page, the words "Provided further, That this act shall not apply to the Yellowstone National Park."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this bill is too general and too important to pass in this way. I object. Here is a bill that refers to a dozen other statutes, and no man can know what they are without having opportunity to refer to them.

Mr. LACEY. I hope my friend will withdraw the objection, and that will give time for the matter to be fully explained. This is a very simple bill.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems to be a complicated bill, and gentlemen ought to have an opportunity to read the bill and see what laws it refers to. I shall object to its consideration in this way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was very carefully drawn by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for the regular order.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, first, I desire to ask a reprint of this appropriation bill (H. R. 10301).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 10301, being the Post-Office appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that general debate close with to-day's session, and that there be two hours' debate upon the contested propositions, namely, special facilities and pneumatic tubes, when those propositions are reached.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE]—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] can speak for himself—and it is very satisfactory with this change: That we have an hour for special facilities and an hour for pneumatic tubes and an hour for free delivery. That would give three hours' debate, half an hour on each side, on these propositions when they come up.

Mr. GRIGGS. Who is opposed to rural free delivery?

Mr. SWANSON. There may be some discussion wanted. It may not be used, but this would make provision for it if it is needed and gentleman want to speak on it.

Mr. GRIGGS. I shall insist on two hours on free rural delivery.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that these arrangements were made with those representing the minority of the committee—not the minority so far as parties are concerned. I had reached an agreement with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who have made a minority report on this bill, and personally I should not feel disposed, without consulting with them, to change that request.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, we have got a debate of two hours on these propositions.

Mr. LOUD. Two hours' debate on these propositions when they are reached.

Mr. SWANSON. An hour on each side?

Mr. LOUD. An hour on each side, one to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and on this side by myself.

Mr. BINGHAM. Four hours on the two paragraphs?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill; and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed with to-day's session, two hours to be devoted to the subject of pneumatic tubes, one hour on each side, and two hours to the discussion of special facilities, one hour on each side.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to make a request of the gentleman from California that he allow at least one hour for general debate on that provision in relation to railway postal clerks.

Mr. LOUD. I do not know why that question can not be discussed to-day. There is no contention in the committee on that subject—no minority report. I have no doubt that an hour for the discussion of that question could be obtained during the five-minute debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not a member of the committee, and other members interested in that provision are not members. I did not suppose there would be opportunity in the general debate for any discussion upon that subject except by members of the committee. I think that provision should be considered when it is reached just as these other questions, because a great many members are very much interested in it. I therefore request that there be an hour of general debate upon that provision when it is reached.

Mr. LOUD. I shall not oppose free discussion, but there can really be no debate on that proposition unless it be upon an amendment to the bill; and that would come up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think there is room for debate on the provision itself independently of any amendment; and I believe the gentleman would not lose anything by setting aside at least one hour for discussion on that provision.

Mr. LOUD. I have no objection.

Mr. GRIGGS. Gentlemen representing the minority of the committee have suggested to me that only one hour be devoted to the discussion of each of the two contested questions already mentioned, the hour to be divided equally between the two sides—that is, half an hour to a side.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I wish to say that there are some other people interested in both those questions besides the members of the committee. The question of the pneumatic-tube service is a question not of $500,000 but millions of dollars to be annually expended by the Government if we embark upon the measure proposed in this bill. I think we ought to have at least two hours of general discussion upon it.

Mr. GRIGGS. I have no objection; I simply made the suggestion.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I want a chance to say something myself.

Mr. GRIGGS. But I do not see why gentlemen can not discuss that question during the course of the general debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. I hope the gentleman from California will consent to an hour's discussion on the provision I have indicated.

Mr. LOUD. I shall not object, though I think it wholly unnecessary, because it is a proposition which will not require any discussion in itself. The only thing that can provoke discussion must be some amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hope the gentleman from California will assent to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. LOUD. I have already stated that I would not object.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask, then, unanimous consent that one hour be devoted to the provision of this appropriation bill relating to railway postal clerks, when it is reached.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California accept that as a modification of his request, or shall the Chair submit it separately?

Mr. LOUD. I assent to it.

Mr. SWANSON. Permit me to make this suggestion: There can be no amendment upon the provision referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota which would not be subject to a point of order. It would seem to me that, if desired, one hour's discussion could be had on that subject to-day as a part of the general debate. If in addition to the general debate to-day we occupy an hour on that subject to-morrow, and an hour on free rural delivery, and these other hours which have been assigned to special facilities and pneumatic-tube service, we shall not get through the bill this week. We have all of to-day for general debate; and I suggest that during to-day an hour be given to the discussion of the feature of the bill in which the gentleman from Minnesota is interested.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was not my request. My request was that an hour be devoted to the discussion of that feature of the bill when that particular paragraph is reached. It relates to one of the most important arms of the service.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the four hours devoted to the two subjects named will be divided equally, two hours on a side, the gentleman from California to control one half the time and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] the other half. The gentleman from Minnesota has added a request which, as the Chair understands, is to be included with the request of the gentleman from California, that one hour be devoted to the question of the railway postal clerks when that question is reached under the five-minute rule. Is there objection to this amended request?

Mr. MOON. Do I understand the proposition correctly? Is it that there be four hours for general debate, and that then during the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule an hour be devoted to the question of pneumatic-tube service and an hour to special facilities?

Mr. LOUD. The proposition is to have general debate on those two propositions—two hours upon each—when the propositions relating to those subjects are reached in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat the request, as the Chair now understands it. The request of the gentleman from California is that this day be devoted to the general debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill, and on to-morrow, or when the subject shall be reached under the five-minute rule, that one hour on each side shall be devoted to the matter of special mail facilities, and one hour on each side to the subject of the pneumatic-tube service, and one hour also to the matter of railroad postal service; the time, namely, four hours, to be equally divided between the two sides and to be controlled on one side by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and on the other by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is now on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the bill presented this year by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is in some respects a most remarkable bill, although, when the rest of the appropriation bills that have already passed the House are compared with this bill, it will then be found to fall within the category of the ordinary appropriation bills passed by Congress. But it partakes of some of the conditions which are the natural results growing out of the recent war. Reason flies from out the minds of men and they seem to contemplate that there is no end to the money in the public Treasury.

While this bill does not meet the anticipations of many or all of the members, I will say, in that it does not, in their judgment, appropriate enough for some objects, yet I sincerely trust, as a citizen of this country, that the sober second thought of this House, irrespective of party, will induce members to support the bill, and that the men who would seek increases in the appropriations of the country, when there should be a check to any increase of extended legislation upon this subject, will permit the bill to go through in the form in which it is presented by the committee after mature consideration and deliberation.

I trust, therefore, that the bill will not be increased beyond the amount recommended by the committee. I know the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is agonizing for an increase here in one particular, and there are some other gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, who are impressed with the belief that the only object left in legislative life here is the increase of salaries of the large army of post-office employees who are now working and knocking at the doors of this Capitol, demanding of the representatives of the people that there shall be an increase in salaries allowed to each of them.

But I hope the members of this House, in passing upon this appropriation, will carefully examine and see if we have not gone to the extreme limit of liberality.

Mr. Chairman, there is a total increase of salaries and salaried officials contained in this bill of $6,233,120. It is not a very large sum of money to the average member of Congress, it is true, and yet when you aggregate the whole appropriation bills it becomes quite a respectable sum.

I am free to say that I have been impressed for some years with this constant and persistent effort on behalf of and by these postal employees for an increase of salary, and have been willing and am willing to-day to bear the odium, if odium there be, in endeavoring to check, in a small degree, this constant demand. My opposition to the eternal cry and the demands of our officials that they shall be continually receiving an increase in salary is based upon a desire to protect the public Treasury, for these officials are receiving as much as they did when general wages were higher and a dollar would not go as far as it does to-day. The time may come—I hope soon—that the strong and able men of all parties will rise here and have the courage to resist the applications continually made to them by one or two or a half dozen of their constituents to increase their salaries, when that increase would necessarily involve the increase of 50,000 more.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I heard a gentleman, once a member of this House—I will not say whether he is a member now or not—when the House contemplated considering the letter-carrier bill, he desiring to pass the bill, when the question was asked, "Why do you support it; you have no carriers in your district?"—he replied, "Yes, I have six; and do you suppose I am going to lose their votes?" And, Mr. Chairman, the passage of that bill would have meant an increase of about $3,000,000 in that one item alone!

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But that is not the reason that many of us ask for increases in this line.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman says that is not the reason that many members favor this increase. Of course I hope that is not the case, yet I venture to assert to the gentleman, and I speak from experience, that the pressure of constituencies in this regard is one of the great factors that impels members to advocate it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. We try to represent them. I do as far as I am concerned.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Michigan says he tries to represent his constituents. I have no doubt of that. I hope that all Representatives try to represent their people, and not a few only, who are specially provided for by the Government appropriation bills.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And I try, and I think all members ought to try who are specially commissioned by his district.

Mr. LOUD (continuing). And the gentleman says who are specially commissioned by his district—I suppose to increase salaries.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Not to increase salaries, but that those who are employed in the public service shall have at least a reasonable compensation for their services.

Mr. LOUD. I am glad the gentleman said that he was specially commissioned to do what is proposed to be done by many members on this floor for the interest of the public service. Now, I was talking of something else——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I said it had no application.

Mr. LOUD. Now, this bill carries an appropriation for post-office clerks, an increase of $1,667,800; for letter carriers, an increase of $1,150,400; for railway mail clerks, an increse of $985,000, and for the employees in the rural delivery service, an increase of $1,450,000; making a total of $6,233,120, which, it seems, does not satisfy the appetite of some.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman there to ask a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to ask what, if any, portion of that increase for clerk hire may be expended in third and fourth class offices?

Mr. LOUD. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HEPBURN. You have just spoken of an increase of over a million dollars in post-office clerks.

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would any of that increase be available for clerk hire in third and fourth class offices?

Mr. LOUD. This appropriation for post-office clerks is for clerks in first and second class post-offices. The law prohibits the employment of clerks in third and fourth class offices to be paid out of the public Treasury.

Mr. HEPBURN. Then there is no change in the law?

Mr. LOUD. No change in the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. And no portion of that sum can be expended in third and fourth class offices?

Mr. LOUD. No portion of this sum can be expended in third and fourth class offices.

Mr. HEPBURN. Where one-half of the people get their mail.

Mr. LOUD. Perhaps; but the gentleman well knows that the percentage of the salary of the postmaster has been considered sufficient since the foundation of this Government to do all the work in the third and fourth class offices, except for separating purposes. The very basis of the salary is not only to provide a salary for the postmaster, but putting all of his necessary clerk hire into his salary.

Mr. HEPBURN. Might I interrupt the gentleman a moment further?

Mr. LOUD. Why, certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman says, as I understand him, that the salary of the postmaster is supposed to be sufficient compensation for all of these labors.

Mr. LOUD. I say it has been so considered since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not true, however, that there is a time in many of the offices—for instance, just before a third class office becomes a second-class office—when there is no appreciable difference in the labor that is necessary, and yet in the one instance the Government may employ half a dozen clerks if it so elects, and often does employ three or four, while not a dollar can be paid to a third-class office just prior to its becoming a second-class office?

Mr. LOUD. Why, of course.

Mr. HEPBURN. The labor in each instance being substantially the same.

Mr. LOUD. Of course; and that same rule would apply if you were to fix a line of distinction between second and third class offices at any point. I do not care where you fix it, whether it be raised or lowered.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will not incommode the gentleman——

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman well knows there must be a point of division between the two.

Mr. HEPBURN. Might there not be a discretion left in the Postmaster-General, so that in those cases he might meet the difficulty?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think the gentleman advocates placing in the hands of the Post-Office Department a discretion to employ clerks wherever they see fit. What would it result in? Postmasters-General and their assistants are but human. The gentleman from Iowa, a gentleman of influence upon the floor of this House, has a constituent who is very useful to him politically. He wants the use of his services during a political campaign. He goes to the Post-Office Department, and with the great influence he has he says, "I want you to allow a clerk there."

Or I will shift the comparison from the gentleman from Iowa and put it upon myself, as chairman of the Post-Office Committee. Do you suppose that the chief of the salary and allowance division would deny me a request of that kind? And if it should be granted in one instance, then he must grant it in another, and when he shall have granted to the gentleman from Iowa and to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee such a request, then it must become general, and the Post-Office Department would become prostituted.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. As to this increase of postmasters' salaries, $1,000,000, will the gentleman explain how the salaries are increased, by addition of postmasters or additions to the salary?

Mr. LOUD. Some of them would be increased.

Mr. FLEMING. In what cases?

Mr. LOUD. Some of them would be for increase of postmasters and others increase of salary.

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman please explain what increases are provided for; do the first-class postmasters all have their salaries increased?

Mr. LOUD. No; the law fixes the salaries of all postmasters, and the Post-Office Department could not go beyond that; whether you appropriate it or not, they take it out.

Mr. FLEMING. This increase of $1,000,000 salary does not involve any change of the law?

Mr. LOUD. No change of law whatever. Now, let me say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] some years ago was anxious about a post-office at Clarinda, which had a separating allowance. At that time there was appropriated for separating purposes about $500,000. The expenditures for this purpose, Mr. Chairman, for more than twenty years had fluctuated from $450,000 to $525,000, keeping along about the same, some years a little more and some years a little less. By the persistence of members of this body that item has grown for three years until we now recommend $900,000—quite a liberal advance, I think, in the allowance for the third and fourth class post-offices.

Separating offices are decreasing rather than increasing—that is, they had for twenty years decreased, and there is no reason in the world why separating offices should have increased during the last three years. So there is something in this bill even for third and fourth class offices, as the amount has nearly doubled in a period of three years.

This bill carries, as you will notice, in round numbers, $114,000,000. I see members of this House who regard me as a boy in membership, but it is a very short time ago that the Post-Office appropriation bill, since I became a member of this House, carried but $80,000,000. The increase that is recommended for this year over last year is $8,307,662, nearly double the increase that ever was made at any time in my recollection, or in the recollection of any member of this House, before in a Post-Office appropriation bill.

And, mind you, $3,157,000 more than the Post-Office Department asked for. And yet there are brethren on the floor of this House that think it is the highest statesmanship to yet increase it beyond that amount.

Now, then, let me say to the House again, the Post-Office Committee has yielded, as far as the point of reason should lead any man, in the direction of increased expenditures in the Post-Office Department. Let me again urge the members of this House on both sides of the Chamber to not increase it beyond the point which we have recommended. If you desire to cut off, I do not think it will hurt the feelings of any member of the committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the balance of my time, unless some one desires to ask a question.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Between one and two years ago a commisson was appointed to investigate certain subjects in the Post-Office Department, of which the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, is a member. I wish he would make some report as to what progress is being made.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Commission is meeting at intervals. Perhaps they have not worked as fast as they should. That is not for me to say. I am not chairman of the commission. It is true the Postal Commission has done considerable work since the time it was appointed, and I think they have narrowed the questions down to one or two distinct matters.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LOUD. I will say, in addition to that, that the commission has taken in testimony some 2,000 pages, I should judge, and are, I think, approaching the time in the near future when they will be able to make a report. I hope so, at least.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. This bill carries an increase of $500,000 for pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. LOUD. That is correct.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that if we undertake to extend the pneumatic-tube service it will involve an expenditure of millions of dollars annually in the near future?

Mr. LOUD. That would appear to me, Mr. Chairman, substantially a correct statement. Of course I know nothing about it practically. I warned this House some few years ago, as the gentleman well knows, against embarking upon this proposition of a pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks it is wise for us to extend the pneumatic service any further; in view of the deficiency in the Post-Office Department, if he thinks it is wise for us to extend the pneumatic-tube service a single inch or a single dollar at this time?

Mr. LOUD. I will repeat what I said last year and the year before, that we should either stop the pneumatic-tube service or extend it.

I have urged the House in days gone by to stop. I urged the House when at the threshold to stop; but the House and Congress in its wisdom have seen fit to continue this service. We have this same pneumatic-tube service in New York, Philadelphia, and in Boston, and the Post-Office Department must know to-day whether it is a success or not. Congress has got about as much information as they ever will have, and Congress should cut it right off back of the ears or else it should continue to extend it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Then I take it that those of us who oppose it will have the powerful aid of the gentleman from California in cutting it right off back of the ears. Is that so?

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the use of the pneumatic-tube service reduces the cost of the service in any other direction, such as the wagon service, or any other service?

Mr. LOUD. My experience has taught me, so far as I have been able to learn, that the wagon service must continue—that is, it has continued where the pneumatic service is in operation. Of course, if the pneumatic service generally covered the city, the wagon service would be reduced to a certain extent.

Mr. OLMSTED. I see it stated in the minority report that express companies of the country carry the mails from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia to Chicago for 1 cent per pound. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is a fact that express companies do carry the mails, anywhere, at any price?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I have great respect for my colleagues who made the minority report—but I would rather not criticise this report, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will excuse the gentleman.

Mr. LOUD. I might say some harsh things about it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman is looking for information. I will say that under the law the express companies can not carry a pound of mail of the first class.

Mr. OLMSTED. That was my understanding; and I will excuse the gentleman from California from saying harsh things about anybody.

Mr. LOUD. If I entered into a discussion of this minority report, it being such a perfectly absurd statement of what appears to be the condition of facts, I might possibly say something I should regret.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question? I should like to ask him in reference to the pneumatic-tube service, covering his experience, whether where the service has existed in New York and Boston it has very much quickened the transfer of mail or not?

Mr. LOUD. From the testimony of the Department, it would show that it very materially increases the expedition, but the testimony——

Mr. MANN. What is the information of the gentleman himself?

Mr. LOUD. Very little.

Mr. MANN. In your opinion it does not very materially expedite the mails?

Mr. LOUD. It does expedite the local mails. There is no doubt but what the pneumatic service is a matter of great expedition of the local mails; but in the outgoing mail and the incoming mail not so much as some people might expect.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say about what proportion of the mail of New York, Boston, and Chicago is local mail?

Mr. LOUD. I would say that in New York, Boston, and Chicago local mail would run about 20 per cent. That is my recollection of how it would run in those cities; it would not be as much in all cities.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. I do so for the purpose of bringing out information which I know he has for members of the committee. The gentleman, in pursuance of his duties as a member of the Postal Commission, visited some European countries last year and investigated among other thing the use of the pneumatic tube in those countries.

Now, I notice in a morning paper an article referring to the pneumatic-tube system as used in other countries. I would like to ask the gentleman if the experience of other countries does not differ in these two particulars from our own—that is, the foreign countries own the pneumatic tubes themselves and operate them; and, second, that they charge extra postage on all matters that go through them? Am I right in that?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman will wait one moment and I will answer him. Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the gentleman there is not a foreign country that I know of that transmits anything in the pneumatic tubes except telegrams and matter which bears an extra charge of from 4 to 6 cents. That is one thing I called the attention of the House to some few years ago, when we were about to embark on this pneumatic-tube service.

The pneumatic-tube service is a necessity at the present time in a certain degree—that is to say, no nation in the world can afford to take a backward step. But what we should have done and what I urged the House to do, as the RECORD will show, was, if we were to inaugurate a pneumatic-tube system, to provide it simply for the accommodation of such matter as paid specially for its transit, just as is done in foreign countries.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the pneumatic tube can be successfully used—when I say successfully, I mean economically and successfully used—for the transmission of all classes of mail matter. It is a service of expedition; it is a service for special-delivery letters and a service for telegrams. Take this service in foreign countries—in England, France, or Germany, where the pneumatic-tube service has been introduced—and it will be found that in those countries the Government owns also the telegraph system.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] dropped, perhaps, an intimation that if the Government was to go into this pneumatic-tube service it should own the tubes. I hope God, in His infinite wisdom, will give members of this House strength enough and prudence enough to prevent the Government from embarking in any more enterprises than it has already embarked upon.

Now, in regard to this telegraph service. I am reminded of what I saw in the Century Magazine for the month of April, quite an intelligent article—the gentleman from Massachusetts has read it, no doubt—in which the writer, with all the confidence possible, assumes to tell the people of this country that the postal telegraph system of England is a profitable enterprise; and he goes on to show how much more profitable it would be if the press of England did not have the postal-telegraph system by the throat; and he intimates that if we had the system in this country, the press could not get it by the throat.

How men can make statements of that kind—and let me say that they are statements that will be believed by a thousand people where the facts will not be believed by one—how a sane man can write an article of that kind and claim that the service is profitable, when the reports of the English postal system are open to every person who desires to read them—are printed, are distributed to anyone who has any interest in the subject—is something I can not understand.

While in England last fall I took one of those reports—the same as anybody can take up who cares to do so—on the English postal-telegraph system. I found that England took on this service in 1870; and let us see how much money it has made on this system since that time. During the first two years after the Government there had purchased this system and created a debt of more than $50,000,000, which it has on its hands to-day, it put aside for the sinking fund the first year £47,425 5s. 7d. The next year it put aside £5,613 16s. 9d.

And there [pointing to a book] is the column of surpluses, and there the column of deficiences, which, beginning the next year at £118,000 have been continuous until the fiscal year 1898, the last year this report includes. The deficiency in the postal-telegraph system of England—and this information is accessible to anybody and was accessible to the eminent gentleman who wrote the article in the Century for the present month—the deficit for the year 1898 was £606,006 12s., or in American money about $3,000,000.

This service, so very profitable, according to the gentleman who ably discusses the question in the Century, shows in fact a deficit since its inception of £7,235,897 5s. 4d., or an aggregate of $36,000,000 in American money, and the debt of more than $50,000,000 hanging over the country to this account.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will print with his remarks the whole of that report. Any member of the House who may read it will see the value of that information.

Mr. TALBERT. Although the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have agreed apparently on the general principles of this bill, I observe that there is a minority report. Now, I would like the gentleman to state on what particular items the committee disagreed.

Mr. LOUD. The minority of the committee dissent on the item for special facilities and the item for the pneumatic-tube service. They are the only two points of disagreement, I believe.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman will allow me to say that I read the article in the Post of this morning with a great deal of pleasure and, as I thought, with a great deal of instruction. Am I to understand the gentleman from California as saying that the actual facts of the case in regard to the pneumatic-tube service do not bear out the statements of the article in the Post? Can it be that that was an advertisement instead of an honest editorial statement?

Mr. LOUD. I did not see the article, so I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BROMWELL. The article referred to by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was not an editorial—simply a news item.

Mr. HILL. I thought it appeared as an editorial.

Mr. BROMWELL. No, I think not; it was a news item on the second page.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the gentleman from California a question. A few moments ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] inquired of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California, as to the statement on page 2 of the minority report concerning the transportation of mail by the express companies; and the statement was made, with something akin to ridicule, I thought, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who volunteered the reply, that the express companies were not allowed to carry first-class mail matter.

The minority report says that the express companies underbid the Government for the transportation of second-class mail matter. Now, does the gentleman in charge of the bill mean to say that the minority statement in this regard is not based on fact, and that the express companies do not carry the second-class mail matter at a lower rate than it is carried by the Government?

Mr. LOUD. There is no doubt of that. They do carry it at a lower rate, under certain conditions and certain distances.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (continuing). And is the statement in the minority report to the effect that the express companies in this class of mail underbid the Government—I mean the second-class mail matter—is that statement true or false? And is the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts an accurate one as to the transportation of this mail matter, that a profit is made by the express companies for carrying such matter for less distances than 500 miles at the rate specified?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I have made that statement so often here that I supposed every member of the House had heard it and is familiar with my views on that subject.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But is there any justice in the comment of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from California, both of whom, it would seem, seek to ridicule the minority report?

Mr. LOUD. I did not so understand the suggestion. It does not seem to me that the attempt was made to ridicule the report.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I did not attempt to ridicule it certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. No; the gentleman misapprehended what I stated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am referring now to the second-class mail matter.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. What I stated was, in substance, that the first-class mail matter could not legally be carried by any other agency than the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it related to second-class mail matter, not first-class mail matter.

Mr. LOUD. I will read, if the gentleman will allow me, in order that there may be no controversy, exactly what appears in the report on this question:

> The best estimate to be made from the proof on the hearings on this question is that the actual expense to the transportation companies in carrying the mails is about 1 cent per pound, and that the express companies (which we are informed pay about 40 per cent of their earnings to railroad companies for hauling their cars) underbid the Government on second class mail matter, and carry it at less than 1 cent per pound on hauls of less than 500 miles, and still make a profit.
> If our information be correct, these companies carry the mails from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia to Chicago for 1 cent per pound. While the postal commission has not reported, yet the press credits their statistician, Professor Adams, as the author of a report based on proof taken before the commission on the question of transportation, which we give, as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But in the same section the minority report says and makes it clear that it refers to second-class mail matter; and says that it is carried at less than 1 cent a pound. Now, the average as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, as we understand here, is 8 cents a pound for carrying the mails.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Massachusetts was only commenting on the part of the report read by himself. I do not suppose the gentleman could have known what else was in the report unless he had taken the pains to read it before.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And I am only referring now to the construction in the report which relates to the transportation of second-class mail matter.

Mr. LOUD. Of course the express companies can carry newspapers, books, and anything else in bulk which is delivered on board the car—a service which the Government would have to do for itself—if it carried the matter for less than a cent a pound. We could, of course, do it, too, if we could get it in bulk. But that is not the condition of the postal service.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, in the House so many times that all of the long-distance matter and all the small single-package matter is carried by the Government at this rate because there is a great deal of difficulty in dealing with small quantities in isolated instances instead of in large quantities, as the express companies may be able to handle it. But that is not exactly the point. What I wanted to say was this——

Mr. BELL. I understand the gentleman from California is speaking of carrying job lots?

Mr. LOUD. No; I do not think I used that word. I spoke of carrying in bulk.

Mr. BELL. Well, we will say carrying in bulk. Now, I understand that there has been an examination in the city of Boston, by a man thoroughly capable, and rates have been made on certain classes of mail matter, under which the rates may go from Boston clear to Chicago and from the west line of Pennsylvania to the Rocky Mountains, at 1 cent per pound, if the charge equals 5 cents.

Mr. BINGHAM. Five cents on what?

Mr. LOUD. Five cents for how much?

Mr. BELL. I mean that they would not take a package at the rate of 1 cent a pound unless it amounted to as much as 5 pounds.

Mr. LOUD. That they would not carry a package for less than 5 cents?

Mr. BELL. I have the express rates from Boston to those points. They only limit to a minimum of 5 pounds.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that this is one of those dangerous statistical fields to enter——

Mr. BELL. Yes; but I have the express company's rate here.

Mr. LOUD. I have seen in the public press a statement of a rate very recently made, over a limited extent of country, in the State of Massachusetts, where they agreed with certain institutions that have a large amount of this matter to take all of their matter, long hauls and short, up to a certain distance of long haul, under some such conditions as the gentleman has stated; but all the public libraries of the country have been before our Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads urging, among other things, that they be permitted to have the pound-rate privilege for the dissemination of the books of libraries, and they say, and the consensus of opinion all over the country is, that the lowest rate that they could get from the express companies was 20 cents; and it seems to me that the combined libraries of the country, which are quite an institution, ought to be able to make as good terms with the express companies as any other interest in the country.

I do not care to enter this field, so far as this question of transportation is concerned, a question which if a man were a master of it, he never would be a member of Congress, because there are many corporations in this country that would be glad to pay him a hundred thousand dollars a year if he were a master of that subject. It is a question which I do not desire to discuss, because there is not one man in ten million who knows any more about the question than I do, which is very little, and I have given it careful study for ten years.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will pardon us for getting information from him. As I understand him, he states that the express companies do carry as express matter what would be second-class mail matter from Boston to Chicago for a cent a pound.

Mr. LOUD. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, those books would not come under that classification in the mail.

Mr. LOUD. I did not say to Chicago.

A MEMBER. It is always less than 500 miles.

Mr. LOUD. The limit is made about Buffalo.

Mr. MANN. The statement was made that the distance was from Boston to Chicago, and that was the statement that was replied to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I understood the chairman to state that they carried to Chicago. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] now says that they carry express matter from Boston to Colorado for 1 cent a pound.

Mr. BELL. No; I say from Louisville. I say they made that rate, when the medical fraternity met there, for their publications.

Mr. MANN. The question I should like to have somebody explain to me is why Houghton, Mifflin & Co., and other corporations of publishers, make such hysterical attempts to keep their matter in the second class, if the express companies can carry it for 1 cent a pound, and it costs the Government 8 cents a pound to do it?

Mr. LOUD. That is a good point. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] two or three minutes to answer that. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I can not answer it.

Mr. BELL. I will answer it. It is for the reason that these companies can send an individual book to any part of the United States by mail, whether it costs half a cent or three-quarters of a cent, under the pound rates; but when you come to the express companies, you must have enough in the package to make a certain rate—whatever they may fix as their minimum. The rate from Boston, as I understand, is limited to 5 pounds or more. I have the rate here that I obtained from Boston. Not only that, but all over New England this second-class matter is carried in large lots for from 35 to 37 cents a hundred pounds.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman from Colorado to say that the publishers would be perfectly willing to have the law modified so that they could not send more than one book at a time to a person and that they be made to pay regular express rates upon all large lots?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that nearly all the publishers who send out in that way send out packages to book dealers and news agents in large lots, and not single books?

Mr. BELL. Some are and some are not. Under the law as it stands at present there is no limit in the number of copies which may be sent to a single individual, and the mails carry them over the lines of wagon transportation as well as on the railroad, which I think would not probably apply to the express companies. They would not make a rate for any of the star routes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it the opinion of the gentleman, after the commission has been in existence for eighteen months, that the railroad companies for carrying the first and second class mail have been only paid a fair price for the use of their postal cars?

Mr. LOUD. That is a rather broad question. What do you mean by a fair price?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. A just price.

Mr. LOUD. So far as my opinion goes, the railroad companies have not been overpaid to the extent, if they are overpaid at all, that our friends contemplate. It is a very fine point, let me say, I think, in the minds of all the commission. While we may differ perhaps on some matters of detail, let me say that I believe it to be the unanimous opinion of the Post-Office Commission, from the testimony we have taken, that if the railroad companies are overpaid, it is by a small margin and nowhere equal to the amount that some people have contemplated. Further than that I can not say.

A great many people are misled by wild statements that are made; like the statement that appears and has gone broadcast over the land, that no honest man should have given utterance to, which takes the report of the Postmaster-General, and says that ten cars running from New York to Buffalo earn $219,000 a year, and gives to the company upon the ten cars $219,000 as postal-car pay, when, as a matter of fact, there were more than thirty cars on the line, the gentleman very cunningly transforming the word "lines" into "cars," and thus the public is misinformed. A statement of this character has wings in its flight, while the truth keeps company with the snail.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it not a fact that the Government pays in the neighborhood of $6,200 a year for the rent of a postal car that does not cost to exceed $3,500?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, I have heard that statement made so many times.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it true?

Mr. LOUD. No; it is not true. They do not pay a cent for the rental of a car. The additional amount of money that is paid where the Post-Office Department occupies a full car is simply for the hauling that additional weight and nothing else.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does it not mean that the Government pays $6,000 for the use of a car that only costs about $3,500?

Mr. LOUD. Why, certainly not. Do you suppose there are any railroad companies in the United States that could afford to haul a car for $5,000 a hundred thousand miles?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think it might in connection with the rest of the things they have to do on the train.

Mr. LOUD. What does the gentleman speak of when he refers to the other things that they have to do with the train?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The other cars that they haul, and the passengers.

Mr. LOUD. Why, I suppose if the railroad companies would charge enough for the transportation of the passengers they might afford to haul the mail for nothing and make it up on the passenger service or some other service; but I hope gentlemen are not discussing this question from that standpoint. If we should pay anything for the transportation of the mails, we ought to pay a fair and reasonable sum.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I agree with you, Mr. LOUD. Otherwise we should not pay them anything, if we are going to compel the railroad companies to make it out of the transportation of their passengers; but if you are going to pay them, then you ought to pay them a fair rate of compensation and no more.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman mentions the Postal Commission. I would like to ask him why it is that the commission have withheld their report, and why they do not bring it forward and lay it before the public?

Mr. LOUD. Why, yes; that is perfectly simple. The Postal Commission have been taking testimony ever since they were appointed.

Mr. TALBERT. I thought they had concluded.

Mr. LOUD. They have simply printed in proof form the testimony as it was taken.

Mr. TALBERT. Did they lay it before your committee, so far as they have gone?

Mr. LOUD. The Post-Office Committee?

Mr. TALBERT. This Postal Commission was appointed to look into these matters that relate to the transportation and cost of first, second, and third class mail matter.

Mr. LOUD. Why, yes. We have had the question before the commission for the last two years. We have a limited number of these reports. We are expected to print this report out of the money appropriated, and we can not afford, let me say, nor do I think Congress can afford, to print this report until we have concluded taking the testimony and have come to a conclusion, and then the report will be printed as a whole.

Mr. TALBERT. I was mistaken about it. I thought the commission had concluded their labors.

Mr. LOUD. Why, we took some testimony only last Friday and Saturday.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has the evidence taken last summer a year ago been printed so that it can be reached by any member?

Mr. LOUD. It has not. There were a few copies printed, I think, of the first 1,500 pages—just a few copies, printed for the use of the commission. You know how copies go. I find myself without a personal copy. My clerk has managed to hang on to his by putting a chain on it. While I had three to start with, I have none now.

Mr. BINGHAM. So that the House may understand, I will ask the chairman of the committee to say something about the broad field which this commission is called upon to cover?

Mr. LOUD. I will say that the commission have not entered particularly or to great extent into the investigation of any question except the railway mail pay, because that is a great question, a greater question than the people of this country anticipate. We were confronted with this state of facts: The railroad people themselves knew nothing about it. I can appeal to my colleague on the commission from Georgia, Mr. FLEMING, who will say that they knew not the slightest thing about the question. We had to grope a long time in the dark before we could find out anything about it. It is such an insignificant portion of the business of the railroad companies that they did not know what it cost.

It was surprising to me that the railroad people themselves did not know, and the railroad experts say it is the hardest thing in the railroad service to determine what any particular character of railroad transportation service may cost; that is, to say what is legitimately chargeable to freight and what is legitimately chargeable to passenger service. When that proposition was first presented to me, in reply to a question put to Mr. Kirkman, of the Chicago and Northwestern, who is regarded as one of the best railroad experts in the country—when I asked him what the service cost, he looked at me and said: "There is not a man on the top of this earth that can ever tell."

I thought he was trying to fool me, and I resented his answer at that time; but now I can readily see the reason of his statement. You can not tell, where there are 100 trains running over a track a day, just how much to charge for this train and just how much to that one; how much this train may wear the track and how much of the maintenance may be chargeable to the running of this or that particular train, or how much of the station agents' or other employees' salaries or a thousand other things are chargeable. Years ago the railroad companies endeavored to keep an account of how much was chargeable to the expense of carrying passenger and how much to freight service, but they have abandoned it as impossible.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill, from all the information he has gathered, prepared to say that the estimates he makes on this subject for railroad transportation are fair and equitable?

Mr. LOUD. The estimates for railroad transportation are simply estimates submitted by the Post-Office Department, in accordance with the present law. While our brethren may talk as much as they please about the railway transportation being exorbitant, and some gentlemen may get up on their hind legs and move to cut the appropriation down a few million dollars, it can not avail until you repeal the law. The law is there, and it can not be repealed upon this appropriation bill.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask for one or two items of figures. I know the chairman has them in his mind. What is the deficiency in the Post-Office Department—what was it last year?

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman want the exact figures?

Mr. FLEMING. No; in round numbers.

Mr. LOUD. A little less than $7,000,000.

Mr. FLEMING. How much is the estimated amount for this year, the estimated amount of deficiency?

Mr. LOUD. About $1,000,000, I think. These are figures that I never take any cognizance of; it is simply the wildest estimate. I know that as good a business man as Mr. Wanamaker estimated a surplus of $11,000,000 in 1894, and for the years succeeding that, thirteen or fourteen millions; and yet the deficiency continued to pile up as long as Mr. Wanamaker remained there. Estimates will not meet results.

Mr. FLEMING. I know that. The chairman has stated that this bill carries $3,157,000 in addition to what the Post-Office Department asks. Will that carry the estimated deficiency up to seven millions, or nearly so?

Mr. LOUD. Of course, the estimates for deficiency are for the current year. I do not think they have made an estimate for the next fiscal year. Perhaps they have. It used to be the policy of the Post-Office Department to estimate deficiencies four or five years ahead; but I think the Postmaster-General has stopped that.

Mr. FLEMING. Does the gentleman mean that the estimated deficiency is for the year that is to close on June 30, 1900?

Mr. LOUD. This estimated deficiency is between four and five million dollars.

Mr. FLEMING. And applies to the fiscal year closing on the 30th of June, 1900?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I received a letter this morning which contains this clause, about which I know nothing, and I want to ask the chairman for information: "I understand that there is a provision in the Post-Office appropriation bill now before the House to raise the salaries of certain clerks in the Railway Mail Service. The lower grade of clerks will not be benefited, but the ones receiving the highest salaries are to have them still further increased." May I ask the gentleman the true inwardness of that proposition, if there is anything to it, and if so, what?

Mr. LOUD. I suppose when we get to that proposition the gentleman from Minnesota will enlighten the gentleman from Connecticut in regard to it.

Mr. HILL. I would much rather have the information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. The increase for railway mail clerks this year is $965,000. The largest amount of increase ever given heretofore in one year is about $235,000. I think I can realize when I am hit in the head with a club as well as any other man, though I do not always yield as gracefully as some other people. But, as I suggested when I started out, there seems to be a very pressing demand for some increase in salaries.

I have said some years ago that the post-office clerks were underpaid. I say again that they are underpaid; that the post-office clerk to-day does not receive an average salary of $700 a year. Last year our bill did carry about $700,000 for the purpose of increasing the salaries of post-office clerks. The bill this year contemplates about the same thing. It is the policy of the Post-Office Committee to bring the average salary of post-office clerks up until it shall be somewhere near a reasonable point.

There was great pressure for the increase of salaries of railway mail clerks, the maximum salary of these clerks under the law being $1,400. In 1884, by reason of the small appropriation given by Congress, the Department cut down the maximum to $1,300, and that has been maintained as the maximum from that time to the present. Your committee, thinking perhaps it was wise to do something in this regard, did take 748 clerks from the $1,300 class and put them into the $1,400 class by reason of the segregation we have made here.

The promotion of those 748 clerks from the $1,300 class to the $1,400 class makes substantially the same increase down along the whole line—perhaps not in the exact number; that I can not say. This is a very intricate question. I do not suppose anyone outside the General Superintendent and his assistant could give exactly the number. But the bill provides for a general lifting up along the whole line—that is, if you lift up the top the rest must follow.

Mr. HILL. Does the bill provide for 748 new clerks?

Mr. LOUD. No, sir.

Mr. HILL. Then how does it lift those in the lower classes by simply increasing the salaries of these 748 clerks?

Mr. LOUD. If you take 748 clerks out of the $1,300 class and put them into the $1,400 class, on the basis of the present number of clerks, it lifts some $1,200 clerks to $1,300, some $1,150 clerks to $1,200, the $1,100 clerks to $1,150, the $1,000 clerks to $1,100, the $900 clerks to $1,000, and the $800 clerks to $900.

In this segregation that we have made there is probably about $500,000 for increases of salary of the railway mail clerks; and, as gentlemen will readily see, their maximum and their average salary is much greater than that of corresponding officers in any other branch of the postal service. This is as far as the committee thought it wise to go, in view of the large increases demanded here all along the line. We had some little compassion on the public Treasury; we thought we would not loot it all at once, but would rather have it extend over perhaps a couple of years. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. At this point will the gentleman allow me a question? At the city of Harrisburg, where I reside, there are 200 railway postal clerks paid at the post-office there $208,000 in the aggregate—a little over $1,000 per man—and 20 per cent of that they must use to meet necessary expenses while away from home. I have this morning letters from several of those men in which they say—I hold one of the letters in my hand—that nearly all the increase of salary provided for in this bill goes to the office force; and of this the railway clerks complain. I desire to ask the view of the gentleman from California on that point.

Mr. LOUD. I have just said that we promote 748 of those men—the men who do the work on the road—from $1,300 to $1,400; and the only increase in the office force is for chief clerks of lines. These chief clerks of lines—I suppose you have one at Harrisburg——

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. That is not a division headquarters, I understand. You have a man there in charge of those 200 clerks——

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Now, up to the present time these officers have been simply railway mail clerks, detailed to perform duty as chief clerks, with a salary of $1,400. This is the same salary which is allowed by law to a railway mail clerk. When we advanced this number of men to the $1,400 class, we did think that these chief clerks—there are only 85 of them in the whole country—ought by right to have a larger salary than the clerks running upon the road, by reason of the greater responsibility imposed and the greater ability required to perform the duties.

Mr. OLMSTED. I simply wanted to know whether your bill does raise all along the line the salaries of those who run on the road. The chief clerk at Harrisburg is a good man. He earns all you propose to give him and more too. But I have a good deal of sympathy for the men who perform the service in the railway mail cars, and wish to see them fairly compensated. Their services are more arduous and useful than those of many Department clerks here at Washington.

Mr. LOUD. It does. It must extend along the whole line, but it does not increase the salaries of every man; neither should it.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a fair bill. These 748 men were segregated from the total of about 1,200 of the $1,300 men, for the reason that they performed a superior service and also because their runs were longer and harder. Every clerk who has charge of such a run is in the $1,400 class.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the privilege of inserting in my remarks in the RECORD somewhere a table relating to the matter of the expenses of the English telegraph system.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from California will extend his remarks as suggested.

There was no objection.

TREASURY CHAMBERS, January, 1899.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BROSIUS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BENNETT, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9139) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. SEWELL, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask consent of the House to have printed in the RECORD the views of the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on the disputed questions in the appropriation bill now before the House for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAY of New York in the chair). The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the report of the minority of the committee on certain disputed questions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The minority report is as follows:

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, not being able to reach the conclusions of the majority of the committee on H. R. 10901 (a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901), respectfully submit for the consideration of the House the following:

We do not propose a review of the postal system, nor to criticise the administration of the Post-Office Department, but to express our views as to the propriety of continuing certain methods in the service. We appreciate the difficulties of a proper and economic administration of this Department and the greater difficulty of providing complete and adequate remedies for abuses that have grown in the operations of the postal system.

The Fifty-fifth Congress appointed a postal commission and directed an inquiry and report as to the conditions in this Department and suggestions for the correction of abuses, to the end that an economic and self-supporting postal service might be inaugurated. The commission, in a long series of hearings, obtained much proof and information on these questions that would no doubt be valuable to the House, but as yet the commissioners have not deemed it wise nor advisable to impart this knowledge to the House, and it is fair to presume that they will not do so, since nearly or quite a year has elapsed since the proof was taken.

We are all conscious of the fact that there can be no material reduction in the expenses of the Post-Office Department unless it be made by a reduction in the price paid for handling the mails or by a reduction in transportation of the mails. If present expenses are continued, the deficit in the Department will continue, unless the growth of the business producing revenue shall extinguish it or it shall be extinguished by an increase in stamp tax paid to the Government for the privilege of using the mails.

There could be much reduction in the cost of handling the mails, but this would necessarily involve a reduction of employees in the service, and of the compensation, which might impair the efficiency to an extent that the benefits the public are entitled to would not accrue; but this is a subject we do not now desire to discuss.

There could, we think, be an advantageous readjustment of the classes of mail matter and of stamp taxes, but there could be no material increase in the stamp tax on all mail matter that would not involve the burden of raising additional revenue from the people, which is not advisable if any other method can be pursued to prevent deficiencies in the postal revenues. The careful consideration of the questions involving the method of handling the mails would probably suggest to men of business habits a means of reduction in expenses along this line. Yet we are satisfied that the main cause of the deficiency in the revenues of the Post-Office Department is largely due to cost of transportation allowed and paid to railroad companies on inland mails.

These companies very properly secure the best terms they can from the Government to perform this service. We ought to pay them such price as will secure to them just and liberal profit commensurate with the risk and obligations assumed by them. We ought not to pay more than this. Your attention is called to the excessive pay for transportation of mails, not with the view of striking out this item of the appropriation bill, for that could not be properly done at this time under contract relations between the carriers and the Government, but that some action may be had by Congress before the beginning of another fiscal year.

We pay an average, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, for carrying the mails, of 8 cents per pound.

The best estimate to be made from the proof on the hearings on this question is that the actual expense to the transportation companies in carrying the mails is about 1 cent per pound, and that the express companies (which we are informed pay about 40 per cent of their earnings to railroad companies for hauling their cars) underbid the Government on second-class mail matter and carry it at less than 1 cent per pound on hauls of less than 500 miles and still make a profit. If our information be correct, these companies carry the mails from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia to Chicago for 1 cent per pound. While the postal commission has not reported, yet the press credits their statistician, Professor Adams, as the author of a report based on proof taken before the commission on the question of transportation, which we give, as follows:

*Facts of grossly excessive pay to railroads for hauling United States mail.

Fixed rate for haul of 200 pounds of mail, average distance, a mile (365 days)	$0.77
Commutation rate for haul of one passenger and baggage (365 days), average distance, a mile	2.07
Commutation rate for haul of 200 pounds first-class freight, average distance, a mile	1.37
Fixed rate for haul of 300,000 pounds of mail, average distance, a mile†	7,317.00
Commutation rate for haul of 300,000 pounds of passengers and baggage (365 days), average mail distance, a mile	3,121.02
Commutation rate for haul of 300,000 pounds first-class freight, average mail distance, a mile	2,048.76
Annual revenues of a passenger car	10,528.00
Annual revenues of a mail car	15,586.00
Decline in freight rates since 1878 per cent	35
Decline in passenger rates since 1878 do	17½
Decline in mail rates since 1878	Nothing.
Percentage of mail to gross railroad earnings (1878)	1.879
Percentage of mail to gross railroad earnings (1898)	2.747
Percentage of increase (1878-1898)	46,000
Percentage of railway pay expenses to gross post-office expenses in 1878	28,000
Percentage of railway pay expenses to gross post-office expenses in 1898	35,400
Percentage of railway pay expenses to gross post-office expenses, increase, 1878-1898	26,000
What a 25 per cent reduction in pay to railroads would last year have saved the Government‡	$8,895,600

These figures show that since the last reduction for carrying the mail in 1878, railroad freights have decreased 35 per cent, and charges for passenger travel have decreased 17½ per cent and that if the Post-Office Department had required the railroad companies to make a reduction of even 25 per cent it would have netted the Government $8,895,600 and would have wiped out the deficit, leaving a surplus for the current year of $2,284,833.

It may be interesting to reproduce the report of the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee, showing expenditures in detail for the last year and the postal revenue.

EXPENDITURES IN DETAIL.

The expenditures of the postal service for the year are shown, by items, in the following statement:

Transportation of the mails on railroads	$31,621,486.12
Compensation of postmasters	18,223,506.81
Free-delivery service	13,800,400.00
Compensation of clerks in post-offices	11,095,554.31
Compensation of railway post-office clerks	8,429,980.00
Transportation of the mails on star routes	4,999,280.88
Railway post-office car service	3,960,953.86
Transportation of foreign mails	1,629,749.83
Rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class offices	1,695,586.73
Mail-messenger service	907,698.25
Manufacture of stamped envelopes	530,155.79
Transportation of the mails—regulation screen or other wagon service	726,162.73
Transportation of the mails on steamboats	454,200.98
Special-delivery service	415,994.02
Mail depredations and post-office inspectors	406,772.89
Mail bags and catchers	274,624.42
Transportation of the mails—electric and cable cars	255,684.19
Manufacture of postage stamps	178,000.00
Transportation of the mails—special facilities, etc	176,963.95
Manufacture of postal cards	142,786.40
Miscellaneous expenses for post-offices, including furniture	175,131.20
Balance due foreign countries	140,101.15
Blanks, blank books, etc., for money-order service	99,552.86
Registered package, tag, official, and dead-letter envelopes	86,108.24
Wrapping twine	89,999.95
Renting of canceling machines	80,436.67
Stationery for post-offices	54,881.57
Experimental rural free-delivery service	149,979.69
Postmarking and rating stamps	25,974.98
Establishment of temporary post-offices at military posts	200,000.00
	101,014,618.53
Expenditures under 21 smaller items of appropriations	420,651.46
Total expenditures for the year	101,435,269.99
Add expenditures during the year on account of previous years	196,890.93
	101,632,160.92

POSTAL REVENUE.

The postal revenue from all sources was as follows:

Sales of stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and postal cards	$87,280,654.01
Second-class postage (pound rate), paid in money	3,527,032.26
Box rents	$2,726,558.04
Money-order receipts	1,286,664.60
Letter postage paid in money, principally balances due from foreign postal administrations	98,031.38
Miscellaneous receipts	58,297.72
Fines and penalties	31,041.42
Receipts from unclaimed dead letters	13,104.74
Total receipts	95,021,384.17
Excess of expenditures over receipts	6,610,776.75

This statement shows that of the total expenditures, $101,632,160.92, the sum of $31,621,486.12 was paid for the hauling of the mails on railroad cars alone—being nearly one-third of the whole expense of the Post-Office Department; the net profits to the carriers over and above reasonable compensation being, perhaps, not less than $10,000,000. The sum asked for and appropriated in this bill for inland transportation by railroad routes is $33,870,000, being a large increase over previous years. In this connection might properly be discussed the benefits that would accrue to the Government by the ownership of its railway postal cars, but it not being our intention to undertake to review all the advantages and disadvantages of the system, we desist with a quotation from the report of Postmaster-General Vilas, made in 1887, which is as applicable to condition now as it was then, being in substance as follows:

"He said to Congress that 432 cars then in the postal service—342 in ordinary use, 90 in reserve—could be bought or their duplicates manufactured for $1,600,000, while the entire annual cost, embracing all necessary labor and ordinary repairs, would not be over $720 for each of the 342 cars in ordinary use, or $246,240, making a total of $1,486,240.

"Yet for the mere use of these cars, including cleaning, etc., the Department was then paying $1,881,580 a year, and the amount demanded for the ensuing year was $2,000,000; this in addition to the 8 per cent per pound under the general item of transportation of mails by railroad.

"On one line $59,037.37 was annually paid for the use of four cars that could be built and fully equipped in the best modern style for less than $17,500, and this in addition to the full-weight pay for transportation, amounting in this case to $504,573.69 annually."

Again, we oppose, for the present, any extension of the pneumatic-tube service and any additional appropriation on this account.

The bill recommends an appropriation of $725,000 for this service, which is $500,000 more than the last appropriation. To our minds the good results from this service are by no means commensurate with the cost. The pneumatic tube is a common iron pipe 6 to 8 inches in diameter and buried in a shallow ditch under ground, through which tube mail is propelled by machinery from one station in a city to another. It is patented, of course; otherwise we doubt if anyone would have undertaken to impose it on the Government. The use of the tube seems to expedite the mails from stations to depots (except where it destroys it entirely in transit) only a few minutes.

We do not oppose any reasonable or necessary method of expediting the mails in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, in each of which a few miles of the pneumatic tube is in service. We favor every reasonable facility that may be needed in these and other cities and throughout the country for rapid transit and delivery of the mails. But we submit that the hastening of the mails for a few moments in the delivery from the post-office to substations and depots in a limited area in a great city which already has from six to nine free deliveries daily can be of no great public benefit. No public necessity exists for such service.

The people in these cities get their mail on an average of eight times a day. This is fast enough, fair enough, and often enough, it seems to us, when seven-tenths of the people of the United States do not get more than one mail a day, and many of them once or twice a week. We do well sometimes to "make haste slowly." This is particularly true when the cost of our extra "fast ways" is so much greater than the benefits or the pleasure we derive from them.

The pneumatic tubes in the city of New York in total length is estimated at 30,000 feet. Proof as to the full cost of this tube varies from $34,000 to $300,000. The cost of the construction to us is immaterial. The thing we are interested in is the rental per annum for its use.

We are charged by the Pneumatic Tube Company for its use in New York the sum of $158,000 per annum, enough of money to build 6 or 8 miles of railroad. When we realize that this pneumatic tube is simply a common iron pipe buried in an ordinary ditch in the ground, through which mail matter is propelled by machinery, it is clear that $34,000 is nearer its cost than $300,000. The pipe is worth about 50 cents a foot; the digging of the ditch and the laying of the pipe would be excessive at 50 cents a foot. Thirty thousand dollars at these figures would lay the 30,000 feet, or practically the whole New York system. To this sum should be added the cost of the machinery and right of way, as to which we are not informed. The Government pays the operating expenses of about $10,000, which is included in the $158,000 rental by the United States. The wagon service carried all the mail from the post-offices to stations and depots before the pneumatic tube was put in use.

The addition of the pneumatic tube to the service has not decreased the wagon service. The Government pays as much, practically, now for the wagon service as it did before the pneumatic tube was used. According to the Second Postmaster-General the pneumatic tube saves nothing in money and only a few minutes in time in the delivery of mails in a very limited area of the cities. The facts in reference to the pneumatic-tube service in the other cities in which it is used are similar to those of New York, the cost of operating being somewhat less.

If this service is valuable for New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, it would be equally valuable for Chicago, New Orleans, and other large cities, and should be extended to them.

We think the benefits of this service would not justify its extension as a business proposition, even in the cities where it is now in use.

The Government is simply operating this pneumatic-tube patent for the benefit of its owners. There is neither necessity nor justification for its use. The fact that it may have official advocates, in view of the unjust contract now being enforced against the Government made and entered into by such officials, rather weakens than strengthens the appeal for the continuation of the experiment.

Again, we oppose the appropriation of $196,614.22 for alleged necessary and special facilities on trunk lines. This sum is paid to two systems of railways, one receiving $25,000, and the other the remainder of the appropriation.

These most remarkable appropriations have been made for some years past and paid out by direction of Congress without any request or estimate therefor by the Post-Office Department. The appropriation is alleged to be made in consideration of extra fast mail over the lines receiving the same.

The mails on these particular lines of railway are carried no faster than they are on many other lines of railway which do not receive this extra pay or subsidy for carrying mails. All of the railways receive compensation amounting to at least three or four times as much as it costs them to carry the mails, and we see no reason for this extra compensation to the roads mentioned. They may have, and no doubt have, changed the time of departure and arrival of trains from terminal points.

Speed may be greater upon these lines to-day than it was twelve or thirteen years ago, but this is true of other lines of railway and nearly all others that are not subsidized. The Department informs us that it pays out the money for these roads because it regards the appropriation as evincing a desire on the part of Congress that it shall be done, although the act may leave it discretionary with the Postmaster-General.

*From 200,000 to 300,000 pounds is the variation between the lightest and and heaviest mail routes.

†Average haul of mails, 813 miles.

‡This saving would have eliminated a postal deficit of $6,610,776, leaving in lieu thereof a surplus of $2,284,833.

The argument that the payment need not be made except in the discretion of the Postmaster-General amounts to nothing, in view of the fact that he treats this directory provision of the statute as mandatory on him and pays out the money on call.

We oppose this subsidy because it is a special privilege and gratuity. We secure no special facility by it that we were not entitled to at all times under the contract with companies for carrying the mail. The contract with all the railroads is to carry the mail with reasonable haste and expedition. These subsidized roads do not and have not done any more than this.

Shall we offer them this gratuity of $196,000 to perform a contract they are already by law bound to perform? We regard this appropriation as a legislative wrong, and it ought not to be made.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN A. MOON,
R. E. BURKE,
JOHN S. LITTLE.

Mr. MOON. I now desire to yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. NORTON] forty minutes of the time allotted to the minority of the House.

Mr. NORTON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it is not so much my purpose to discuss the bill now under consideration as it is to present some observations to the House and to the country on a subject of more direct interest to my people and to the section of the country from which I come. I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] on the subject of the amount of taxes paid for educational purposes in his home town and in his State.

His remarks were directed at Alabama, placing that State in contrast with his own on the subject of education. Let me say to the gentleman and to the country that when all the facts and conditions are considered, any Southern State will, I think, compare favorably with Iowa or any other Northern State in all matters. The difficulties of such a comparison are to get the facts in such way that the whole truth may be conveyed to the public mind and to those not of the South who assume to discuss conditions at the South. It is not true that cold figures alone and unexplained always present the whole truth.

The South has been placed at greater disadvantages and labored under greater difficulties than one from Iowa or any part of the country outside of the South can well conceive of or believe. I wish to tell the gentleman that the State of South Carolina, with a property assessment of less than $200,000,000, has paid as her proportion of pensions about $40,000,000 over and above every dollar that has been received by pensioners in that State, an amount more than one-fifth of her taxable property paid in cash for this one specific purpose, or an average of over $1,000,000 per annum. From all the Southern States, and, if you please, from the eleven seceding States, there has been paid for pensions over $500,000,000 in excess of the amount paid to pensioners in that section of this country.

And in addition to this heavy tax upon the South—at which I am not now complaining—the people of that section have contributed about $1,000,000,000 for the extra interest charged against her people because they had no money and were obliged to borrow—to borrow from and pay interest to that section of the country to which she was already making such immense contributions in other directions. Still, if the burdens borne by the South stopped here, its condition would be far better than it is.

In addition to these two items, the South has contributed not less than a billion and a half of dollars to the protected industries and interests of the country above any benefits received. The Southern States, being in the main producing States, have been obliged to sell their products in the open markets of the world in competition with similar products from every other country. At the same time they have been forced by the laws of this country to buy in restricted and protected markets—markets created and guarded by the tariff duties of the United States.

The South has thus, in every particular, been placed at great financial disadvantage. Since the civil war she has had wrung from her products and her labor not less than $2,500,000,000 for which she has received nothing at all. And all this loss comes since she lost all she had in the war. Yet the South is taunted with her poverty and her want of educational facilities—so often so that we have grown somewhat accustomed to unkind and ungenerous treatment, unkind and ungenerous taunts as to our poverty and our character.

I wish to give an instance of this sort of treatment we have been continually receiving in the shape of a general indictment. This comes, too, from the last place from which such attacks ought to come. It comes from a paper seemingly now very busy trying to clean the Augean stables at its own door.

The North American, of Philadelphia, in an editorial on the 29th of March last, headed, "More turmoil down South," says:

> The usual spring epidemic of lawlessness appears to have broken out in the South this year with more than customary violence.

And after the usual bright and artless application of such a smart analogy, the editor continues:

> The Southern people, because of their failure to respect and obey the law are in a pitiable state. Their patrimony, the richest part of this rich Republic, lies barren and neglected, because capital, always sensitive, refuses to in stall itself in a region where social conditions are so unsettled and precarious. What the end will be we do not venture to predict. But this much we do know: The present reign of criminal and political disorder must soon give way to sane, healthy, and humanizing influences, or the South will gangrene the whole body politic.

"Pitiable state!" "Reign of criminal and political disorder!" "The South will gangrene the whole body politic!" Shades of Penn and Franklin, look in pity, from your resting places above, down on poor, benighted Philadelphia's great moral and political censors! Why, the South in her darkest days of negro domination never reached such systematic frauds, falsehoods, and crimes as are charged by the North American and other Republican Philadelphia papers against the citizens of their own city and State, members of their own party. The most heinous crimes ever charged against the South are not worse than those which are now being brought to light in the rock-ribbed Republican State of Pennsylvania.

But crimes committed in the South are thoroughly magnified by these newspapers, printed with huge sensational heads, and they are flaunted before the country as Southern. The same crimes committed in Pennsylvania or other parts of the country than the South are given as merely ills that human society is heir to, and they go uncommented upon, on obscure pages, except when there is a falling out of rascals in a local fight.

We recognize the grave injustice done to our people by such treatment; but we have suffered in the main silently, trusting in the future and the ultimate fairness of public opinion to vindicate the integrity of character of the people of the South. "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

Pilate asked: "What is truth?" Not caring for truth, he hastened on in his work, staying not for an answer. Pilate was helpless in his own weakness; under the influence of the howling mob he went on to his work of desolation and death. This act of an officer whose conscience prompted him to inquire as to truth, but whose courage was not sufficient for the duties of the hour, gave to the world a tragedy, the darkest in its history—a tragedy so criminal in its character and so subversive of every principle of truth and justice that nature itself revolted and the sun in meridian glory veiled its face in darkness, refusing to witness the scenes produced by Pilate's perfidy.

Nearly nineteen centuries have thrown their shadows over this past, and no answer has come to Pilate's question, "What is truth?" And it will not be given except in the life and character of the object of Pilate's folly and weakness, as He rises and spreads truth with "healings on His wings for the nations," and people of the North, we may hope, as well.

For half a century the South has been the subject of the inquiry: What is truth as to its conditions and its character? No answer has come to our inquiring Northern brethren, and none will come to indifferent and prejudiced ears. Questioners such as the North American, like Pilate, blinded by prejudice and ignorance, listen to the rabble and release a Barabbas instead of truth; they turn loose false statements, robbers of truth and of the character of the South.

That sectional prejudices growing out of the legislative and forensic struggles before the war and the animosities and bitterness engendered by the actual conflict itself should dethrone reason and obscure justice was but a natural result. It was no less natural that this bloody strife should be full of sadness as well as bitterness. The plaintive wail of the orphan and widow rose above the sound of the curses that were heaped upon us and moved the strength of Southern manhood to turn toward the rebuilding of its homes and the tilling of its farms. The soldier and his sons took up the hammer and laid hold of the plow to smother in labor a growing wrath and to conquer in silence a humiliating oppression. Thirty and odd years should have informed the ignorance and silenced the falsehoods and misrepresentations of detractors of this people.

With the flower of her manhood slain or maimed in battle, despoiled of her property, but upheld by a courage still sublime, the South patiently, zealously, and manfully faced her new conditions. She had to make bricks without straw. All had been lost but her manhood. Under such industrial and social conditions as obtained in the South the strong hand of military government was in itself galling enough; but harsher conditions yet were laid upon our people.

The war was hell; military rule, humiliation; but, worse than war, worse than famine and pestilence to the South, worse than the contribution of hundreds of millions of dollars, was the period of reconstruction. The frogs and flies, the locusts and lice, the darkness and death sent to plague the Egyptians in the days of Moses were not worse than the carpetbag and scalawag governments of the Southern States. It is, indeed, bad enough for manly men, face to face, to grapple in deadly conflict; but for one party to be pinioned by bayonets, ruled and robbed by an order of things and a class of men who would disgrace the jungles of Africa, was beyond the imagining of Dante. Those were dark days for the South. Manhood revolts at the memory.

It was the teachings of those days, Mr. Chairman, that made the lynchings of to-day possible. And who were those teachers?

Missionaries sent to the South from the North. Pennsylvania has the distinction of having sent to us one of the principal teachers of and instigators to every crime in the calendar of crimes in the person of the most notorious John J. Patterson. Ohio gave us R. K. Scott, whose name will ever be remembered with scorn and contempt by every decent man, white or colored, in the State over which he presided as governor.

Massachusetts sent us B. F. Whittemore, who himself was expelled from this House for dishonest practices. These were typical missionaries who came South after the war, took charge of the negro, controlled him, and taught him that it was not wrong to rob and murder white men, to spoil and ravish white homes. The now dilapidated houses, where B. F. Whittemore once gathered together the negroes of his community to initiate them into the mysteries of all political and social crime, still stands in a corner of my own district, a passing monument of those dark days.

Up to the coming of these missionaries you could find among the negroes of the South no case of and no cause for lynching. To those gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Ohio and Massachusetts, and their fellows from other parts of the North, who came South to prey upon the prostrate States after the war—to their benevolent political influences and benign social teachings is American history indebted for the tale of lynchings in the South. Since those days some of these notorious missionaries have brought their ill-gotten Southern gains to the North; Northern corporations have taken them up and made them millionaires and influential gentlemen. Most of those sent home for the good of the South have had the ears of the newspapers and they have seldom failed to malign, misrepresent, and slander our people. While the South has been painted blacker than their own souls by these artists in iniquity, it was taken all to be too true by more honest men at the North.

Many lies have been circulated with all the earnestness of conviction by comparatively honest men who have stayed not for the South's answer to the question: What is truth? The purse and the reputation of the South have been hurt for the time being by such a false condition; but truth will triumph and the South stand resplendent in the light of the great name made by a great and splendid people. Unscathed by the blight of war, unsullied by the rot of reconstruction, undaunted by poverty, the South maintains its integrity of character, and on top of the Pisgah of Hope, in full view of a grand future, she looks out over "a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines. and fig trees, and pomegranates: a land of oil olives, and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it; a land whose stones are iron and out of whose hills thou mayst dig brass."

Just out on the west corridor of this House is a beautiful picture. It gives to the eye the story of the pioneers seeking homes in the West. The rollicking boy, the young man and maiden, the stalwart father, the mother, all are there in that great caravan of slow-moving ox wagons, seeking new lands and freedom in the broad West. On a mountain top in the distance a young man lifts aloft the Stars and Stripes, waving hope and encouragement to those below winding slowly on through mountain passes to fairer land beyond. Over all is written this legend: "Westward the course of empire takes its way."

For centuries the tide of emigration has been westward. Starting, we are told, on the far-away steppes of central Asia, wave after wave of humanity surged over southwestern Asia into Africa, only to meet the impenetrable desert of Sahara; and afterwards over western Asia and Europe to the long impassable Atlantic. For other centuries the scepter of empire rested on the shores of the Atlantic, shifting from nation to nation until Anglo-Saxon supremacy was established. Then the bridge that another people had thrown across the tempestuous seas became crowded with throngs again going West. Westward still did the course of empire take its way, until at last it touches the East. Now it looks in another direction.

And the near future must change the words of this legend. The scout of progress and empire on the mountain will face about and look toward the sunny lands of the South; for southward the course of empire will bend its way. The finger of the Divinity that shapes the destinies of this Republic points southward to-day. The sun of a Southern ascendency slowly rises above the horizon of its adversity and poverty. The mists and fogs of falsehood will pass away before the power of a new supremacy, will lift before the light of truth—a truth revealed in the character, virtues, and intelligence of a hitherto misunderstood and traduced people.

The South realizes that neither defeat nor adversity nor even death itself is the worst that can befall a people. In poverty it has learned that man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. And these many years has the South traveled in sorrow and adversity toward a certain, bright future. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years."

To those who taunt us with our poverty, whether they be from Iowa or elsewhere, we would say, "Thy money perish with thee," if with it you do not bring us a true sense of duty and a true appreciation of character. You may leave millions to train your sons. Those millions may, and there are those who think they are, used to beget effeminacy and bring decay. "A gigantic fortune may roll up like a snowball, but a sunny day may melt it. The growth of such wealth as that of the Rockefellers is not automatic. It requires a combination of favoring conditions, together with a genius for piracy. All these things may not be found in the next generation."

The boys of the South are being trained in the great school of adversity, in poverty, and want. Such a school is developing brain and brawn, which in time must tell, which in time must gain the ascendency. The future of the South is full of good things; the opportunities of young manhood are nowhere better. And the young men of no section of the country are better fitted to take advantage of them than the young men who live daily amid them.

The rich blood of her tens of thousands of brave sons poured out upon hundreds of battlefields as a libation to what they believed right and duty, enriching Southern soil, was not spilt in vain if the South remains true to its own splendid example. That it will do so can not be doubted. It was a Southern boy, Worth Bagley, who was the first to give his blood and his life for us in the Spanish-American war.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, let me say to my friend that the first shot in the Cuban war was fired from the cruiser Nashville, the namesake of my home city, where rest the ashes of Andrew Jackson and James K. Polk, and the shot was fired by a Tennessean, Captain Maynard.

Mr. NORTON of South Carolina. The first blood shed on Cuban soil by an American soldier was that of Dr. Gibbs, who was born in Richmond, Va. Hobson, of Alabama, sank the Merrimac in the mouth of Santiago Harbor, after Victor Blue, a South Carolina boy, had located the fleet of Cervera within it. The Southern youth may be depended upon in war or in peace to do his duty and maintain the good name and high reputation of his fathers.

Thirty years ago the South was crippled, but she had unsurpassed natural resources. It had not strength, no implements, no opportunity to develop these resources. Labor was disorganized; there was no money and no adequate transportation facilities; our people stood near helpless and discouraged amid this abounding wealth of resource. But the South has now emerged from that period of ruin. With strong and steady purpose, energetic and progressive, she moves sanguinely forward, gathering power with momentum and greatness with confidence.

Those who malign, slander, and misrepresent conditions at the South, who falsify history to blacken the reputation of her people, will hardly believe the truth of these things. But this does not discourage us, as the South moves onward and upward conquering and to conquer all obstacles. From a condition of wreck and ruin, amid adverse criticisms and unfriendly influences, the South has reached a position of comparative independence and industrial prosperity, not by virtue of the good will of any other section or by virtue of favorable national influences, but in spite of ill will and unfavorable influences.

The immortal Henry W. Grady, in his last public speech, said:

> Far to the South and separated by a line—once defined in irrepressible difference, once traced in fratricidal blood, and now, thank God, but a vanishing shadow—lies the fairest and richest domain of this earth. It is the home of a brave and hospitable people. There is centered all that can please or prosper human kind. A perfect climate above a fertile soil yields to the husbandman every product of the Temperate Zone. There, by night, the cotton whitens beneath the stars, and by day the wheat locks the sunshine in its bearded sheaf. In the same field the clover steals the fragrance of the wind, and tobacco snatches the quick aroma of the rains. There are mountains stored with exhaustless treasures; forests, vast and primeval; and rivers that, tumbling or loitering, run wanton to the sea.
> Of the three essential items of all industries—cotton, iron, and wood—that region has easy control. In cotton, a fixed monopoly; in iron, proven supremacy; in timber, the reserve supply of the Republic. From this assured and permanent advantage, against which artificial conditions can not long prevail, has grown an amazing system of industries. Not maintained by human contrivance of tariff or capital, afar from the cheapest source of supply, but resting in Divine assurance, within touch of field, and mine, and forest, not set amid bleak hills and costly farms from which competition has driven the farmer in despair, but amid cheap and sunny lands, rich with agriculture, to which neither season nor soil has set a limit, this system of industries is mounting to a splendor that shall dazzle and illumine the world.

To-day the South has $1,000,000,000 invested in manufacturing. Her manufactured output is valued at $1,500,000,000, and her factories pay to labor annually $350,000,000 in wages. The cotton mills alone of the South represent a capital of $125,000,000, and their 6,000,000 spindles will consume 2,000,000 bales of this year's crop of cotton made at their doors.

Twenty years ago, in 1880, Southern cotton mills contained 584,000 spindles, using 221,000 bales of cotton, and turned out $21,909,717 worth of cotton goods.

In 1890 the number of spindles reached 1,605,000, using 545,000 bales of cotton, producing $48,066,504 worth of goods.

For this year the best estimate gives not less than 6,000,000 spindles to Southern mills, to use 2,000,000 bales of cotton and producing not less than $110,000,000.

The same ratio of increase for the next twenty years, without regarding the inevitable acceleration of growth that must come, will give to the South 60,000,000 spindles, using 15,000,000 bales of a 20,000,000-bale crop of cotton. Seven billion five hundred million pounds of cotton unmanufactured is worth about $500,000,000, and manufactured certainly not less than one and a half billion dollars.

And this will pay investors not less than 20 per cent on their investment, or some $300,000,000 to manufacturers and at least $150,000,000 to producers annually, making a net cash amount of money poured annually into the channels of trade in the South of $450,000,000 from this one source alone. This leaves $1,000,000,000 for the labor in producing and the labor in manufacturing the cotton crop. The possibilities of the South in the matter of cotton alone are now almost incomprehensible. She can produce fifteen, thirty, sixty million bales of cotton, and will do so if conditions justify or her interests require.

England now has about half the spindles of the world, operating in an area less in size than an average cotton State. But England's proportion of spindles is already decreasing. It is confidently expected that there will be yet a great increase in the demand for cotton goods in many parts of the world. It is toward the South that all are now looking. It is being called upon not only to produce the raw material, but to send out the manufactured article to supply the new demands that are coming for cotton fabrics.

With coal about 50 per cent cheaper, raw cotton about 15 per cent cheaper, and building material from 25 to 50 per cent cheaper than in Old or New England, with a better climate and longer hours, what is to prevent the continued and accelerated growth of cotton manufacturing in the South? When there is a profit of 20 per cent to 40 cent on the capital invested in sight, it will take much pressure of artificial fear of Southern conditions and much wild talk of the negro problem to make money stay where it can not make more than 10 per cent at the outside.

And there is nothing of the fabric of dreams in these figures. When we remember the mighty strides that this industry has made during the last thirty years has been in the face of intensely adverse conditions; that it has been weighed down by the heavy hand of unfavorable legislation and of discriminating freight rates; that it has been retarded by the lack of money as well as its increase in value year by year; that it has gone on in the face of social and industrial ostracism such as few sections of the world has ever known; when we remember that success is the cause of success, that restrictions must be removed, that prejudices must and will pass away, then we can but believe that our prophecies fall far below the mark.

It is not in the field of cotton industry alone that the South has shown its wonderful progress. The South's production of coal has risen from 5,959,209 tons in 1880 to 42,863,448 tons in 1899; and there is no reason why the same ratio of increase should not continue and our output go to over 300,000,000 tons in 1920. Of coke, the South produced only 299,430 tons in 1880; in 1899 it produced 5,140,977 tons, an increase of over 1,600 per cent.

The South produced 308,031 tons of pig iron in 1880, and 2,360,554 tons in 1899; and in 1920 there seems to be no reason why we should not send from our mines something like 18,000,000 tons.

The South produced 474,614,756 bushels of grain in 1880, and increased that to 748,796,476 in 1899. Twelve hundred million bushels is what we expect from our farms in 1920.

There was 20,000 miles of railroad in the South in 1880 and 50,000 in 1899. We will need and we will have the transportation facilities of 100,000 miles of road in 1920.

In 1880 there was 750,000 tons of phosphate mined in the Southern States, and in 1899 there was 2,000,000.

"Possessing half the standing timber of the United States, the South is building up an immense lumber and wood interest, and it will not be long before she will entirely control this trade."

In 1880 there was $3,500,000 invested in cotton-seed oil mills in the South, and in 1899 this was increased to $40,000,000. The products of the cotton seed are becoming valuable and important, and at the same time the fight against these products is assuming formidable shape. At the same ratio of increase we will have in 1920 over $300,000,000 invested in cotton-seed oil mills.

The South can produce sufficient tea for the use of her people. The growth of this plant has passed beyond the stage of experiment in the South, and we are only awaiting the further diffusion of the facts already absolutely established by scientific experiments and for mechanical improvements that are bound to come to see the South producing all the tea for this country. There are many persons in my district now who grow these plants as ornamental shrubs, incidentally obtaining enough tea for their own and their neighbors' use.

The South can grow 72 varieties of field crops and 65 of garden vegetables, fruits, and melons. After feeding her own population she can supply that of the North, including Iowa and Pennsylvania. There can be no doubt of our future. It has been well said that "under Anglo-Saxon domination, with stable government, liberal and just laws in the protection of property rights," which will be given by an Anglo-Saxon domination of the government, the South is "destined to enjoy a prosperity more splendid than has ever been vouchsafed to any other people, ancient or modern."

"The astonishing richness of its resources, its situation with reference to the commerce of the world, the marvelous fruitfulness and versatility of its soil, the character, extent, and variety of its minerals, the amplitude and value of its forests, and above all the virile strength, the intelligence, the quenchless energy and high courage of the dominant race, with its love of freedom and its executive ability, are factors in the future growth of the South that no other country in any age has brought to bear upon human energy." Mr. Chairman, this is the country and this is the people who are charged by those ignorant of the truth with being lawless and with gangrening the body politic, morally and politically.

The South has as yet no great ships to ply the ocean, carrying the products of her fields and factories to other countries and to other peoples; but the day is not far ahead when the lumber of our forests will float the fruits of our fields and the fabrics of our factories to all lands that need them, far and wide the world over. And we do not ask the aid of any Hanna-Payne ship subsidy bill to help us. The South could afford to pay the proposed ship subsidies out of the net results of the protective tariff benefits on one crop of 15,000,000 bales of cotton manufactured at the South and sold to the North and the rest of the world under the Dingley law. Our day is coming; you can not keep the South down.

Those whose vision and view are warped by selfishness, prejudice, and malice, begotten of ill-will, can not accept our conclusions as to the South. But evil opinions of us will not disturb the South, nor deter us on the even tenor of our way toward prosperity and industrial supremacy. With that consciousness of rectitude and that consecration to duty toward country and toward God which bespeaks the devoted man, our people will move onward, supremely indifferent to the jeering multitudes of Sanballats and Tobiahs, who would impede our progress and destroy our character and our country.

Nehemiah said unto his people: "Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste and the gates thereof are burned with fire; come, let us build up the wall of Jerusalem that we be no more a reproach." So the South. "But," Judah said, "the strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall." The people of the South realize the force of the old prophet's language as applied to their own country. The old Confederate veteran feels that "the strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed;" we all see that "there is much rubbish" of prejudice, of falsehoods, and of misunderstandings of the South, left from the fire and sword of days of war and from the false conditions of a reconstruction. But all this must disappear; it is disappearing. May the God of Nehemiah help us! May the stalwart young men of the South carry forward to completion the triumphs of industrial superiority so auspiciously begun by their burdened fathers!

Mr. Chairman, let me say in conclusion that these are not idle tales for credulous ears I am repeating. I have hardly begun the story of our struggles and our triumphs. One who knows the truth of it all would exclaim, like the Queen of Sheba, that the half of the wonderful tale had not been told. We would not detract one iota from our Northern neighbors, from their prosperity or their glory. We only hope for the dominion and the supremacy of our common country in every field of life when we look forward to the day when somewhere South—may be at Charleston or Georgetown or Port Royal, S. C., I hope so—"there will be built a commercial city that will be to the modern world what Rome and Venice and Carthage were in the ancient world. From it will go forth the most varied and the most valuable products, mineral and vegetable and manufactured, to all parts of the earth to bring returns for the enrichment and the glory of the Southern States."

When that narrow isthmus that now divides the two greatest oceans of the earth is severed it will bring the teeming millions of the Far East thousands of miles nearer the South and let in a flood of business which will swell the tides of commerce that ebb and flow on our Southern shores. Southward the course of industrial supremacy and commercial empire will take its way. The day will soon come when millions of bales of cotton manufactured in Southern looms, when millions of tons of iron wrought in Southern forges, when millions of feet of lumber cut by Southern mills will find their way to every port washed by the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Indian oceans.

"Southern tobacco, borne on the speedy wings of commerce, will soothe the temper, or stimulate the action, or regale the senses of millions of people who now employ a weak substitute for it." We are called upon to supply the needs of the Occident and of the Orient. The duty is ours and the rewards of the honest worker, of wealth, of honor, and of power shall be ours also.

And those who dislike the South and find fault with all she is, does, or has been, will learn of its progress. They will find that "wherever civilization erects its standard, whether among the coral islands of the South Seas where the perfume of perennial flowers fills the air with sweetness or in the frigid region where winter reigns and clothes with an icy mantle the surface of the earth or in the temperate zone of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in sunny India, or in frozen Finland," Southern products—coal, cotton, lumber—will find profitable markets. The world will be placed under tribute to the South.

And as the sun of the South's material progress rises and warms into life these slumbering and germinating resources of wealth, her intellectual and moral manhood will grow and spread the graces and beauties of that higher and better life which makes men and women great, patriotic, prepared for the sublime duties of that manhood which shall usher into existence an era of industrial, intellectual, and moral supremacy which shall be the glory of this nation and the crown of the South. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the greatest bills that comes to this House for its consideration. It is a bill that involves one of the most important expenditures of the Government, one that is open to probably more extensive abuses than any other bill that comes before us for our consideration, and one has only to look at the number of members present to learn what interest they propose to take in reforming a condition that is now heralded all over the country as a standing scandal in our public service.

The chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads this morning, with all of his ability and that of his associates on the committee, were really unable to answer the questions of gentlemen on his own side of the House with reference to certain conditions involved in the bill. He avoided them, and refused to give, or failed to give, the information asked, saying that he had been over this field so often, that he had so repeatedly answered questions of the same kind, that every man ought to know the condition of our postal service from memory.

But I notice that when the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] came forward and presented a point that every man who has a mind must have recognized as an important and essential element in the consideration of the bill, and stated that the minority report in this case showed that the second-class mail matter, which is fixed at 1 cent per pound in the United States, is taken from the Post-Office Department by the express companies at that price, and, said the gentleman from Wisconsin, if that be true, as stated in the minority report—that is, that the express companies can haul second-class matter from Boston to Chicago for less than 1 cent a pound—how is it, then, that we are paying for carrying mail of the same character, 8 cents per pound on the average on all the mails transported by the Government of the United States when they are carried for distances of 450 miles or over at the price which is indicated in the minority report?

How is it, if this is true, that we are not paying too much for carrying the mail when it is shown that we pay 8 cents per pound on the average on all mail matter in the United States when it is carried less than 450 miles on the average, every pound of it? And when the gentleman was asked the question by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], "If the express companies will carry the second-class matter for less than a cent a pound, why is it that these publication companies swarm around Washington and send their petitions here asking that we do not disturb the second-class matter?" the gentleman said he would give way and would yield time to "the gentleman from Colorado," myself, to answer the question.

I stated then, and I state now, that one of the main reasons is that in sending through the mail you can send any amount—for instance, an ounce, a half ounce, 1 cent's worth, a cent and a half's worth, and you can send it over every star route in the United States. That is one of the reasons for fixing the low second-class rate.

I promised the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I would give them the express rate on these books.

Now, let us see what the express rate is. But before I give you the express rate, I want to impress upon the mind of every member here that the express companies are understood to pay the railroad companies 40 per cent of their earnings for the carriage, and when you figure upon what the express companies carry these packages for, you must consider the railroad company as only getting 40 per cent of that rate. Not only that, but the express companies pay big dividends yearly upon their stock.

Now, let us see about this book business. The question was raised whether books could be carried for that rate. Here is a copy of the advertisement of the Adams Express Company on books:

> Tariff on books: Periodicals which are registered in the United States Post-Office as second-class matter, shipped by publishers and news dealers, between points west of Ohio and Pennsylvania, covering the entire district between the west line of Pennsylvania and the Pacific coast, 1 cent.

From the west line of Pennsylvania to the Pacific 1 cent a pound is the rate advertised. Minimum charge, 5 cents. In other words, you can not get the express company to carry a book the postage on which would not be as much as 5 cents. That is one of the advantages, and the only restriction on this service or on the corresponding service as to any other kind of registered second-class postal matter is this, that the minimum charges are 5 cents.

> Second-class matter when so registered is carried by the express companies from the west line of Pennsylvania to the Rocky Mountains for 1 cent a pound.

Now, let us see. The gentleman would carry the impression that the express companies only get the work of carrying the second-class matter for short distances. In other words, he carries the inference that the second-class matter is carried for 1 cent per pound over the short distances, simply because the express companies take the material at the office of the shipper and deliver it to the consignee at his home, things which the Post-Office does not do. Now, let us see whether that is true or not. Let us see what they charge in the New England States for carrying newspapers, which form the larger part of the second-class matter:

> Classification. Newspapers, daily, forwarded on the day of issue, between all points except New England, where present local rates are from 35 to 37 cents per hundred pounds—

That is, in the New England States generally the rate is from 35 to 37 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. GAINES. Carried by whom?

Mr. BELL. Carried by the express companies. Where the papers are not sent out on the day of issue, they charge a higher rate.

Mr. GAINES. What is the mail rate?

Mr. BELL. The mail rate is 1 cent a pound. The express rate is 35 cents a hundred pounds in the New England States. Therefore, of course, the express companies get the haul. I quote now from the statement of a gentleman whom I had make this up for me in Boston:

> The business manager of the Boston Globe told me, on March 15, that this rate of a half a cent a pound carried Boston dailies all the way through from Boston to Chicago.

That was the rate of half a cent a pound. Now, the express rate goes further, and agrees not only to carry these books and periodicals, but it fixes a rate for the return of unsold issues of newsdealers at the same price as the second-class rate in our postal service.

Now, why is it that that becomes so important in this controversy? The reason was seen by the gentleman who was interrogating the chairman of the committee this morning. It is this: If the railroad companies and the express companies can compete for second-class matter by offering a rate of 1 cent a pound from the west line of Pennsylvania to the Pacific, then the Government, in paying them 8 cents a pound for an average haul of less than 450 miles, is undoubtedly paying an extortionate rate. For that reason the matter was presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the chairman of the committee seemed to be unable to answer it just at the time or to catch the force of his question.

Now, sir, this post-office matter has become, I say, an open scandal. There is no doubt about it. It has been an open scandal for ten years. There is no doubt about that. We have had it up here repeatedly; they have had it up in the Senate repeatedly; the Postmaster-General has had it up repeatedly. We have been repeatedly informed by the public press that it is outrageous, and yet without doing anything from that committee or any other committee of the House, except as is evinced by these minority reports showing these outrages. When Mr. Vilas was Postmaster-General he unquestionably went into these propositions more thoroughly than any other man who has ever been in the Post-Office Department. He went into them to the extent of showing that the railroads of the United States dominated the Post-Office Department.

He went into it to the extent of showing that under his administration a railroad in one of the New England States, when he tried to make terms with it, informed him that if he desired to throw his mail sacks into freight or any such cars as they had provided from place to place, he could do so, and that they did not propose to make any arrangement for the United States mail. He stated to Congress that it was your duty and mine to pass an act requiring these railroads to make and provide better facilities for carrying the mail and require them to carry it at a reasonable rate.

Not only that; Postmaster-General Vilas took every car that was then in service during his administration. He gave you the cost of those cars; he gave you the cost to the Government of the same cars, and he said to Congress that the Government of the United States paid not only the full value of every car for its use annually, but paid more; and he advised that the Government should build its own postal cars and own them; and showed that he could duplicate the cars in use for the rent charge for one year, own them, and have a surplus of a million and a half dollars, with nothing except the casualties to come out of it. It was also estimated that the life of a car is twenty years or upward.

That created somewhat of a sensation. It was up in the Senate and here. They had their investigation in the Senate, and they showed that for many years railroad men have dominated the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of this Government. Roads have been making contracts with themselves to carry the mail. They showed by Mr. Neilson, when he was on the stand before the Senate committee, that he came from the office of superintendent of a railroad company to the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and showed by him that his predecessor left the Second Assistant's office and went into the office of traffic manager of a New Jersey road, so he must have been a railroad employee also.

Mr. Gorman, on the committee for the Senate, declared that every man who had investigated this question in the United States realized that it was the greatest extortion that ever was perpetrated upon this Government. Now, sir, bear in mind that prior to 1878 every few years the Government obtained a reduction in the charge for carrying the mails corresponding with the reductions of the general freights and the reduction in passenger travel. That was the general custom up to 1878. It seems about that time the railroads conceived the idea of getting their friends worked into the Post Office Department, and working their measures differently; and from 1878 up to this minute they have no record of any effort being made in good faith to secure a reduction of the rates for carrying the mails, with the exception of Postmaster-General Vilas, who tried but failed to get successful action.

And not only that, but the general reduction on freight rates since 1878 is 35 per cent; the reduction on the cost of passenger travel since 1878 is 17½ per cent, according to the figures of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and yet we sit here and pass this enormous bill for over a hundred million of dollars for carrying on the greatest postal system in the world, and at the same time, notwithstanding the great machinery in Washington, the great machinery in every great city, the great machinery all over the country, the transportation charges are more than a third of this entire bill. Yet we sit here and the Post-Office Department is inert and these men go on. Do you wonder, under these conditions, the chairman of the committee, in one of his elaborate reports on the Loud bill, announces to this House and to the world that any private individual can run the Post-Office Department and save from thirty to forty million dollars a year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there has been no reduction in the rates for carrying the mails since 1878?

Mr. BELL. Not any; and I do not know of their being asked to reduce the rate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do you know any reason why the rates should not be reduced for carrying the mails, the same as they are for passengers and freight?

Mr. BELL. Every principle of ordinary justice and common honesty demands that they should be so reduced.

Mr. LANHAM. If the rates were so reduced, would it not enable the great masses of the people of the country to have the benefit of penny postage?

Mr. BELL. There is no doubt about it in the world. But I want to say, further, that we have been a little to blame for this matter in this House. Many of us who ought to be friends of this measure have stood here session in and session out and voted for subsidies because the trains ran through our communities. We have voted for these subsidies because some people of our own neighborhoods got the advantage. We have voted for subsidies not demanded by the Post-Office Department, so that it does not facilitate the carrying of the mails. Take that into account, spread it all over the United States, and you can get some insight into the abuses of the Post-Office system.

Now, let us go further. The newspapers of the United States——

Mr. FLEMING. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. FLEMING. Is it not true that two years ago when this subject was being discussed the extravagance of the Department was shown up, and a resolution was introduced by myself to investigate this question, in order that the House might have the absolute facts, as near as could be ascertained, on which to base their action?

Mr. BELL. Yes; but I have never been able to see a report of that august committee.

Mr. FLEMING. The attempt was at least made.

Mr. BELL. Yes; that attempt was made growing out of the exposure of these supposed outrages on a hearing of one of the Loud bills. But growing out of the evidence taken before that committee there has been published in the public press from time to time figures that were claimed to be taken from capable and worthy experts before that commission showing somewhat the condition.

Now, I find that some of these figures, as worked out by the Chicago Tribune—and these figures and conclusions of the Tribune are said to be taken by the Tribune itself from experts before that hearing. It first shows a thing we all know from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the general rate of freight has fallen 35 per cent. That paper figures out, taking the charges of last year, and says that if we had a reduction of even 25 per cent it would amount to nearly $9,000,000. That would pay the deficit and leave us nearly a $3,000,000 balance.

If we should put it on an equal footing with passenger traffic, or if we should by analogy say the mail should be carried at the same per cent as humanity is carried, it would still be a great saving, if we should gauge it by the reduction in that traffic. Then he takes the car and shows that the ordinary passenger car in the United States earns to the companies on an average a little over $10,000 a year; that a car which does not carry human life and human blood—where the company is not responsible for the loss of human life or limb—produces to the owner over $15,000 a year. It also takes up the figures that it gathered from the experts before this committee, which has not yet reported, and shows that in every instance the companies have largely increased their earnings on postal service, while their decrease has always been on the passenger and on the general freight traffic.

Mr. BARBER. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked him a question?

Mr. BELL. No, sir.

Mr. BARBER. You say they earn about $15,000 a year simply on the postal car?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. BARBER. Does that include all their remuneration for carrying the mail in the cars? Are they not paid besides that so much per pound?

Mr. BELL. I understand that includes all. As shown by Secretary Vilas, they first pay for the room in the car, or what they call a rental of the car. They pay an annual rental for the car itself, as he shows, in excess of the actual value of building the car. They first paid that; then they paid in addition to that 8 cents a pound for carrying the mails in that car. And from these figures he discovered the extortion and demanded that the Government of the United States build its own cars, own its own cars, and arrange with the railroads to haul these cars; and he said within sixty days he could arrange to run the cars as a department of this Government without any friction whatever.

Mr. LOUD. Who is the gentleman quoting from?

Mr. BELL. From Mr. Vilas.

Mr. LOUD. Let me show you how much in error Mr. Vilas is. There never was an amount equal to 8 cents a pound paid any railroad company for transportation of the mails.

Mr. BELL. And handling.

Mr. LOUD. They do not handle it.

Mr. BELL. They move it from the depot to the offices when within a certain distance.

Mr. LOUD. There never was an amount equal to 8 cents a pound paid the railroad company according to any system of figuring that I ever saw. As a matter of fact, the figures of last year, which are the most accurate of any year, show that the railroad companies are getting a fraction less than 2¼ cents a pound.

Mr. BELL. There are three Postmasters-General, one after another, who have figured that it runs from 8 to 8½ cents a pound. Not only that, but during the same time they show that the weighing was not correct; that some of the companies hauled all kinds of dead matter and fraudulently padded the mails in the weighing season.

Mr. LOUD. Of course the gentleman does not want, and can not afford, to misstate what is an apparent fact. No Postmaster-General ever did contend, permit me to say, that the railroad companies were being paid either 8 or 8½ cents a pound, or more than 2 or 3 cents a pound.

Mr. BELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken. The statement repeatedly made by Postmasters-General was that transportation cost 8 or 8½ cents per pound; but in that, mind you, they included the salaries of the letter carriers and all other classes of transportation. No Postmaster-General ever stated that the railroad companies were receiving 8 cents per pound; but those officers have repeatedly stated that it did cost 8 cents per pound, and some of them have said 8½ cents, for all classes of transportation, including ocean service, star-route service, mail messenger service, regulation wagon service; and then they added in half of the salaries of letter carriers to the cost of transportation to make the amount 8 cents. Those are facts, which the gentlemen will find upon investigation; and he can not afford to be wrong.

Mr. BELL. I do not wish to be wrong; but I have never found any two persons having any connection with this subject who agreed, and it seems, from what I know of the witnesses before the gentleman's committee, there have never been found any two who agree there. But I wish to say that it has been generally stated by Postmasters-General that the transportation charges were from 8 to 8½ cents per pound, and that the average haul was from 432 to 446 miles.

Mr. LOUD. Now, the gentleman will let me say that a portion of his statement is correct. Eight or 8½ cents for transportation charges is correct, but there are a great many millions of dollars paid for transportation which is not railroad transportation.

Mr. BELL. I know that.

Mr. LOUD. It seemed to me the gentleman was overlooking that distinction.

Mr. BELL. There are $4,000,000 and more paid for star-route service.

Mr. LOUD. About $5,000,000 for star-route service.

Mr. BELL. But I venture to say that the star routes are not charging more than the railroads—probably not as much.

Mr. LOUD. But that comes in as a part of the question of transportation.

Mr. BELL. I wish to say further that the history of postal service in the United States shows that wherever you have put the mails on the railroad the cost of carrying the mails has increased instead of decreasing. I have copies of a number of contracts entered into before the establishment of railroads—when you had pony service and afterwards—and generally in favor of pony service, so far as cost goes.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Does the gentleman think the mails of the United States could be carried cheaper now by pony service than they are by rail?

Mr. BELL. This question has been contracted in both Europe and this country. After the building of the railroads, England, in a number of cases, took her mails off the steam cars and went back to the pony service, showing a saving of four to ten thousand dollars a year by the pony service. I could show you the contracts made for carrying the mails in various parts of the State of New York—the actual contracts before the railroads went into service. Then after the mail was put upon the cars, the railroad companies in a few weeks said: "If we carry these mails every day, you must increase the pay a little; if we make greater speed than the ordinary freight traffic, you must increase the pay a little for the purpose of expediting the mails." And history shows that the charges of the railroad companies have in many cases gone as high as 300 per cent beyond the charges for pony service at the time the railroads were built.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Does the gentleman believe that this service could be done with more expedition and with greater convenience to the public than at present by going back to the old system?

Mr. BELL. No, sir; I am not claiming anything of that kind. I do not want to go back to any of these obsolete systems.

Mr. KLUTTZ. That is what I thought.

Mr. BELL. What I want is for this Government to walk up and say that it will have its business transacted as individuals transact theirs. I want them to put into the Government service men who represent the Government, not the railroads—men who will go to these railroad companies and insist that we get the same reasonable rates of transportation that individuals get. That is all I want. That is all anybody wants. No one desires to oppress the railroads. But I say, as is shown by newspaper after newspaper, Republican and Democratic, this matter has become an open scandal.

And not only that, Mr. Chairman, but while this Loud bill was up at a former Congress there were men going over the country soliciting capital to encourage its adoption. In the course of that solicitation an agent was sent in connection with the matter to the mayor of Toledo, Ohio, Mr. Jones, who was lately a candidate for governor of the State of Ohio, who stated that a subscription paper had been started, and told him that it was for the benefit of the commercial bodies to support that bill, and showed him where numerous men in Chicago and other big cities had contributed from $5 to $10 each in support of this bill. Mr. Jones said, in response to this agent who called upon him, that he would look into the matter, and if he found it all right he or his company would sign a petition and send their check for $10, and asked him where he should address him, and he said, "In care of the Adams Express Company, New York."

Mr. Jones says about that time he saw an article in the Outlook, a magazine, which showed it was not a bill in the interest of the public, and he declined to make the contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. BELL. I would like to be permitted to proceed, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments longer.

Mr. MOON. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for ten minutes more.

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will take my further time to comment upon the article to which I had just called your attention in the Chicago Tribune, a leading newspaper of the Republican party in that great center of commerce. One thing, among many others they say, is that the facts are all wrong; that the figures are not correct; that the computation is false; and, sir, I want to say that until somebody in this House comes before the House that knows more about these outrages and can give us more information than we have heretofore had upon the subject, we will be compelled to adopt the figures given by the Chicago Tribune and other newspapers instead of the haphazard statement of some of the members on the floor of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me read what appeared in the issue of March 10 of this year—a statement by Professor Adams, statistician of the Michigan University, on the revenue from postal, passenger, and freight traffic. Here is the statement:

ARGUMENT FOR REDUCTION.

Facts of grossly excessive pay to railroads for hauling the United States mail: Fixed rates for haul of 300 pounds of mail, average a mile, 365 days, $34.77; commutation rates for haul of 1 passenger and back, 365 days, average distance a mile, $2.07.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. I only wish to say that Professor Adams never made a statement of that character, in any manner or shape whatever, and the statement never had any foundation of fact.

Mr. BELL. Do you know if he made a statement at all in this connection?

Mr. LOUD. He never made a statement of that kind or a statement similar to it.

Mr. BELL. How do you know that?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I am a member of the commission, and I know the matters that came before it.

Mr. BELL. But what does the gentleman say as to the statements made to the Tribune reporter? This purports to have been an accurate statement of what was presented to him.

Mr. LOUD. Of course I do not know except in a general way. I am, however, quite certain that no such statement was ever made to the Chicago Tribune, or to any other paper, from a person having full knowledge of the subject. The gentleman has seemingly confounded two different statements by different people. Mr. Acker testified before the commission, but I am satisfied that Professor Adams never made such a statement. It would have indicated as little knowledge of the subject as might be reasonably expected in a 5-year-old boy.

Mr. BELL. He seems, however, to be perfectly satisfied on the point in question. But I will accept the gentleman's correction.

Mr. FLEMING. In that connection, in behalf of Mr. Acker, I wish to say that that article was called to his attention, and he said that he was in no wise the author of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELL. Well, that is what I wish to say to you, gentlemen——

Mr. FLEMING. I am only saying that in behalf of Mr. Acker, and the paper does not attribute the authorship of the article to him.

Mr. BELL. The Tribune says it got that from Professor Adams, of the Michigan University.

Mr. FLEMING. I do not know whether that is true or not. I know that Mr. Acker, before the committee, said he was not responsible for it. I am making this remark now in protection of Mr. Acker.

Mr. BELL. I will tell you that this is not a reflection on Mr. Acker.

Mr. FLEMING. I do not think so at all.

Mr. BELL. Because, in my judgment, it tells the truth.

Mr. FLEMING. But I simply wish to say that what Professor Adams is reported to have said Mr. Acker had nothing to do with.

Mr. BELL. The commutation rate for the haul of one passenger and baggage, three hundred and sixty-five days, average distance 1 mile, is 2.07.

Fixed rate for haul of 300,000 pounds of mail, average distance 1 mile, 7.317. Annual revenues of a passenger car, $10,528; annual revenue of a mail car, $15,586.

Mr. OLMSTED. Right there, if the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I should like to know on what railroad and in what part of the country?

Mr. BELL. He is taking the average. He is averaging up the earnings of railroads in carrying the mails and in carrying freight and passengers.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman has stated the annual revenue of a passenger car to be ten thousand and some odd dollars.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. On what railroad?

Mr. BELL. Oh, the average of the United States.

Mr. OLMSTED. From what source does he get any such information?

Mr. BELL. He would get it from the statistics of railroading.

Mr. OLMSTED. You can not find those figures in any interstate-commerce report.

Mr. SIBLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Colorado if he has read the hearings before the commission?

Mr. BELL. I never was able to get the hearings. I have asked for them.

Mr. SIBLEY. They are published.

Mr. BELL. They told me not. They told me they were not published.

Mr. SIBLEY. In the hearing before the Senate committee the statements of experts are given, and if the gentleman will figure it up I am sure he will find those figures are not correct. I do not know who is the authority for that statement. The chairman of the committee [Mr. LOUD] states that it is not Professor Adams, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLEMING] says it is not Mr. Acker.

Mr. BELL. But these gentlemen do not know who gave the information to the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. SIBLEY. But here is sworn testimony showing an entirely different state of facts.

Mr. BELL. They tell me they have got every conceivable kind of testimony, and they tell me that they had to go to railroad men principally for their evidence.

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, what would be a better source of information to show the cost?

Mr. BELL. There is no doubt in the world that if you leave it to the railroads to say whether these charges are reasonable, as Congress seems to be doing, they will say that they are very reasonable. Self-interest will require that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BELL. I will say that unless I can get some more time I must go on without interruption.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the same article it says that a 25 per cent reduction in the pay of railroads last year would have saved the Government $8,895,609.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Now, the fact is, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, that the transportation of mails on all railroads cost $31,621,486.12.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. If my figuring is correct, 25 per cent of that would be $7,905,371.53. Now, in that article, in that statement, rightly or wrongly attributed to Professor Adams, there is one mistake of nearly a million dollars in figuring out what 25 per cent of the amount paid to railroads would be. If that is so, can we rely upon the rest of the statement as being any more nearly accurate?

Mr. BELL. I shall not admit that these figures are not correct.

Mr. McPHERSON. But you know that 25 per cent of thirty-one million is not $8,895,000.

Mr. BELL. This is a late report here. I do not think he has figured on that probably. And then you know $31,000,000 is not all. The transportation charges on the mail amount to a great deal more than $31,000,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. But the transportation paid to railroad companies is $31,000,000.

Mr. BELL. That is general transportation. There are a lot of special things in here in different places—electric cars and steamboats, etc.

Mr. OLMSTED. A steamboat is not a railroad.

Mr. BELL. That may include all the railroads, and probably does. But now you will have to excuse me until I finish this statement.

The decline in freight rates since 1878 is 35 per cent; decline in passenger rates since 1878, 17½ per cent.

I understand those figures come from the Interstate Commerce Commission and that their reports show those facts.

Decline in mail rates since 1878, nothing; percentage of mail to railroad earnings in 1878, 1.879 of 1 per cent.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say this in connection with what you have passed: The very authority from which that comes will show the mail rates have been reduced 42½ per cent, which the author of that article saw fit to leave out and say nothing about. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BELL. The mail rates?

Mr. LOUD. The rate per pound is reduced 42½ per cent.

Mr. BELL. Where is there any authoritative information about the subject? The Post-Office Committee, or some of its representatives, have attacked the figures of every Postmaster-General since I have been in Congress and have said they were inaccurate and unreliable. They have attacked the statistics, and they have shown when men come before them the experts of railroad companies have overthrown it. Now, what can you believe then? I would like to know who we are to believe.

Mr. LOUD. The commission are trying to get complete information on the subject.

Mr. BELL. There has been a great deal of wool pulling over somebody's eyes.

Mr. LOUD. There has never been a subject on which there has been more misunderstanding. I think when a gentleman is discussing this measure, and other men listening, when he has never investigated this question at all, he should not assume he can solve it in a minute when the commission, after working hard for two years, have not been able to solve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BELL. I thank you.

Mr. LOUD. The commission have had at their command the man who is recognized as the best expert in this country, and they are trying to get at what is accurate on this question. That the Post-Office Department has misrepresented—not with intent—there is no doubt.

Mr. BELL. Of course not.

Mr. LOUD. They have misrepresented, and such has been the testimony all along the line. The gentleman will recognize it is a very difficult question to solve in a back room of a house in a few minutes, and the less a man says upon this question until he knows better about it the better his own record will be hereafter, because it is a question, let me say to the gentleman again, that no man in the country had any adequate conception of. The commission is bringing it down so that we hope to present to Congress in the near future as accurate a statement in this case as possible.

Mr. BELL. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. But I want to say, in my judgment, it does not take a very wise man to see the abuses that are going on in the Post-Office Department. It does not take a very wise man to see, when these important places are filled by railroad managers and by railroad superintendents, that there is something wrong. They can not deny that.

Mr. OLMSTED. What office is so held?

Mr. LOUD. Who does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BELL. I refer to the fact that when these abuses were brought up, the examination showed that for years the Second Assistant Postmaster-General had come from some great railroad corporation down to the position in the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SIBLEY. So far as the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General is concerned, he has had no connection with the railroads.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman refer to Mr. White, the head of the Railway Mail Service——

Mr. BELL. I am speaking of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Shallenberger is the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and he has never had any association with the railroads.

Mr. BELL. This examination that I referred to a moment ago showed that both Neilson and Lowry Bell were connected with railroads. One was a manager of a New Jersey railroad, and the other a superintendent of an Ohio railroad, and they went in there from these positions, or especially Neilson.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken about that. I do not think that Lowry Bell ever had any connection with the railroads.

Mr. BELL. Well, Mr. Neilson stated it before the Senate committee.

Mr. LOUD. When he went out of office as Second Assistant Postmaster-General he took service with a railroad company; and I do not think for one moment that the gentleman from Colorado is so pure and high-minded a man that he would not accept service for a railroad company after he had left Congress if they would pay him enough for his services as an attorney.

Mr. BELL. Unquestionably not.

Mr. LOUD. I know I would take service for a railroad company if they would pay me $50,000 a year.

Mr. BELL. I do not think there should be any misunderstanding. My understanding was that he was a railroad man before and after.

Mr. LOUD. I understand not.

Mr. BELL. You probably understood that from the answer of Mr. Neilson himself. He declined or evaded that part of the question, and says "is now."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Neilson was an employee of a railroad company.

Mr. BELL. I said he was superintendent.

Mr. LOUD. Assistant superintendent.

Mr. BELL. Superintendent——

Mr. LOUD. And he is the only man.

Mr. BELL (continuing). Of an Ohio railroad when he came. They asked him what Lowry Bell's position was, and he said, "He is traffic manager of the New Jersey road." Do you suppose he would go from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office into a traffic manager's office of a great railroad without he had an education in railroad matters? Do you suppose he would reach a high position like that without a railroad education? I understand that he was for twenty years in the railroad business. I know Neilson was.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, Neilson, yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Assuming the gentleman's statement is correct, that Second Assistant Postmasters-General have been railroad men, does not the gentleman believe that the training a railroad man would get in that capacity, other things being equal, would make him a better official than a man who had not had that experience?

Mr. BELL. If separated from the railroad companies, yes; but every indication is that they were still a part of the railroad company, and they left their offices here and went back to the railroad offices again.

Mr. LOUD. Did Neilson?

Mr. BELL. I do not know what became of him.

Mr. BROMWELL. He was superintendent of the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railroad, over which I ride twice a day. I know him thoroughly, and I do not believe that Mr. Neilson while Second Assistant Postmaster-General was influenced in favor of any railroad corporation to do anything but his duty.

Mr. BELL. Well, it is pretty nearly impossible for a man to give twenty years' service to a railroad company and then go into the Department and make contracts with the railroad company——

Mr. BINGHAM. There are no contracts made with the railroad company.

Mr. BELL. Contracts made with the railroad company for carrying the mail?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; there are not.

Mr. BELL. In fixing the rates that they shall be paid?

Mr. BINGHAM. The rates are fixed by law.

Mr. BELL. And they do only the annual weighing?

Mr. BINGHAM. They do the weighing every four years.

Mr. BELL. Then it seems to me it is time some action was taken by the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. If there is any wrong being done, yes.

Mr. BELL. Now, if you will let me, I would like to finish my disputed compilation of figures.

Percentage of railroad pay, expenses, and gross post-office expenses from 1878 to 1898, 28 per cent; post-office and railway pay expenses and gross post-office expenses in 1898, 35.4 per cent; percentage of railway pay expenses and gross post-office expenses increase from 1878 to 1898, 26 per cent. A saving of 25 per cent in the pay of railroads last year would have saved the Government $8,895,609.

Explanatory note: From two hundred to three hundred thousand pounds is the variation between the lightest and the heaviest mail route. The average haul of mails is 813 miles. This saving would have eliminated the postal deficit of $6,610,776, leaving in lieu thereof a surplus of $2,284,833.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me to insert in his figure some things that are left out? When a gentleman is quoting tables he is, as a rule, apt to quote only his own side. The gentleman should insert there that the weight of the mail has increased 555 per cent during this period, which is something that the gentleman making the tables forgot to put in.

Mr. BELL. During what period?

Mr. LOUD. During the period that you are citing, from 1878 to 1898.

Mr. BELL. Is not that a private weighing not authorized by statute?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman was quoting the increased cost from 1878 to 1898. The gentleman who made the tables gave out these figures and forgot to put in the fact that the weight of mail had increased 555 per cent—double the increase of freight.

Mr. BELL. Well, that would be a material fact, I admit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such further time as the gentleman may desire.

Mr. BELL. Now, I am not criticising the chairman of the Post-Office Committee as intentionally avoiding these things. If there is any man in the House in whom I have confidence, it is the gentleman from California; but I have thought that he has worked over and hammered over these post-office matters and the Loud bill until he gets pretty near in the shape of a man riding a hobby.

I believe there is something wrong in this, but I believe he is right on one other thing that comes before this House, which this side always supports, and that is the subsidy of the Southern railroads. There is a thing the Postmaster-General has opposed from year to year. They have insisted that it does not expedite the mail a single particle, and it shows the influence, it shows the influence of our constituents, it shows that when the constituents of my district or your district come at us on things that we do not believe in in another man's district, we are liable to yield.

If that is so on this subsidy going into the Southern States, I want to know if you can object to the same influence bearing on a matter where they want to keep up the rate in Pennsylvania and other States in the Union. It seems to me there is no question but that if we could wipe out all the deficit, we could have a second-class rate as it is with just limitations, and we could have our free delivery in the country where the population justifies it, and still have no deficit.

Now, I know that this bill is to pass as it is. At the same time I know that there is something wrong. I know that the companies are charging as yearly rental the full cost of the car. Secretary Vilas not only made the showing when he was Postmaster-General, but he made the same showing on the floor of the Senate and urged the same action. We do nothing about that. We do not say we will build our own cars and then require the railroad companies to run them for a reasonable sum, but we go on year in and year out paying the full cost of a car as rental year by year.

Now, the people will learn the facts of this case in time. Mr. Vilas said in his reports that the time would come when this would be such a scandal that the eyes of the public would be opened. But we did nothing. We allowed a road in Massachusetts to refuse to make preparation for the mail. Postmaster-General Vilas suggested to us that we should pass an act requiring the railroad companies to prepare these facilities. We have not done it. We come here year in and year out and make these enormous appropriations, shutting our eyes to all of the enormous charges.

I do not believe there is a man in this House who, if he will investigate and scan this bill, will fail to become convinced that the charges are extortionate. And I will go back to the statement of the chairman of the committee, who gives it as his judgment officially in his report, that a private individual running our postal system could save annually from thirty to forty million dollars—over 33 per cent of the aggregate amount expended. I cite that statement as evidence that there is something wrong.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIBLEY. In the hearings before the Senate committee I find a statement made by Mr. Baldwin, who quotes a statement of Mr. White, General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in regard to the 432 cars referred to in the report of Postmaster-General Vilas. Superintendent White states that the actual cost, as near as can be estimated by the Department, to the railroad company for hauling, lighting, heating, and repairing of one of those cars amounted in a year to $10,871, while the pay by the Government under the law for the use of that car was $6,250.

Mr. BELL. A loss of $4,000 a year!

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; in round numbers. That is the statement of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. BELL. It is a wonder to me that these railroads do not all break in carrying these mails.

A MEMBER. A great many of them have broken.

Mr. BELL. I do not see how they have managed to exist at all. In 1878, when the other freight which they were required to move was 35 per cent higher and passenger traffic 17½ per cent higher, they must have lost 50 per cent on every piece of mail they carried through the country.

Now, my friend, there are in my State two railroads running parallel, and they are clamoring over the question which of them shall carry one certain mail pouch. They are enormously interested in the contest as to which of them shall carry a single mail pouch from Grand Junction to Denver every day. The railroad that does not receive the contract makes a great howl. One of them offered to put on a special car if they could get a certain privilege of carrying the mails.

Mr. SIBLEY. Is it not true that competing railroads in their eagerness to do business are often willing to do it at a loss? Why, sir, in my district there is a run of 140 miles made every day in the year for which the railroad company receives $1,000 a year and furnishes half a car. Does the gentleman think that excessive compensation?

Mr. BELL. Well, my friend, you must take into consideration the entire mail service. It is shown by competent statisticians that some parts of a road in this country pay 3 per cent of the cost of the road out of the mail service alone.

Mr. SIBLEY. I should like to see those statistics.

Mr. LOUD. What was the statement of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. BELL. I say there are statistics showing that certain parts of a road in the populous portion of New York State pay from their earnings on the mail service 3 per cent of the cost of the road.

Mr. SIBLEY. So it has been stated that the Erie Railroad earned 3 per cent on $164,000,000. Yet, in order that this should be true, it would be necessary that the company should receive annually more than fifteen times the amount of compensation that the road has ever received in any one year.

Mr. BELL. Has the gentleman lived this long and does not know yet that the railroads of the country are trying to pay interest on three or four times the cost of the roads?

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will consider he will find that they pay but a very small interest or get but a small proportion of interest out of the revenues derived from the Post-Office Department. For instance, the amount paid by the Government to the Erie Railroad Company for the transportation of the mails over that line would not pay anything like the proportion of interest upon the capital stock, which the gentleman from Colorado seems to imply. The total cost of the road——

Mr. BELL. You are talking of the whole cost of the road.

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes; I am talking of the entire cost of the road.

The Government pays the Erie Railroad less than one-half million dollars per annum for the transportation of the mails, and yet a statement has been made here to the effect that we are paying 6 per cent on the capital stock of the road, which is $150,000,000. Now, that would be $9,000,000, and yet the Government pays them only one-half million dollars for mail service.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the gentleman should remember also that not one-half of the railroads are paying dividends under existing conditions. Certainly none of them are paying dividends on the postal receipts.

Mr. BELL. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania think, then, that unless we raise the price we pay the railroads for the transportation of the mails, we will have very many bankrupt roads?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, I hope not, Mr. Chairman. The roads are managed in a successful and generally profitable business manner. I do not anticipate that they must depend upon the Government for their support.

Mr. BELL. But I think, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the House, when they come to the question of dealing with these railroad corporations, are more easily turned away or "thrown off their feet" than by the consideration of any other question.

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, that may be possibly true.

Mr. BELL. Every man here who was present in the Fifty-fourth Congress, when we were trying to settle the question of the Pacific railroads' indebtedness, knows exactly the conditions that were then existing on both sides of the House. The committee came in here and depreciated the value of the Government property and insisted that the Government could never get a dollar out of it. It got to be the common byword here that we had to give the whole thing up and the Government had no equities.

That proposition passed through the House in some sort of a form and went to the Senate. And what was the result? Now, Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that millions of dollars were received from the claims of the Government in that regard. And we had then the unpleasant spectacle in the House of our own committee standing here and undervaluing, depreciating, and running down our own securities! And now when we come here and ask a reasonable rebate of the railroads for mail facilities, we will find men in all parts of the House get up and really believe, or assume to believe, that the Government is oppressing the roads!

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me at that point?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that the companies—the railroad companies—are trying to pay about 3 per cent—or that, in fact, they are enabled to pay 3 per cent—out of the mail receipts?

Mr. BELL. No; I did not say that. I said that certain statisticians have demonstrated the fact that in certain parts of the United States the railroads got enough from those parts of the road to pay 3 per cent on the actual cost of construction.

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, let me state to the gentleman that there are 7,100 miles of railroad in the New England States alone, costing an average of $60,000 a mile. That involves a total cost of about $425,000,000, and at 5 per cent the proceeds would amount to $21,000,000. The aggregate pay of these roads from the postal service is but $1,679,000. It would, therefore, appear that the gentleman has made a mistake in his calculation when he asserts that these roads receive an exorbitant amount from the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will you allow me to ask a question in that connection?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Do you know what these roads are capitalized at for taxation purposes?

Mr. SIBLEY. I am not familiar with that proposition.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman said that there were more gentlemen "thrown off their feet" by these railroad questions, when we come to consider them, than by any others that we have to deal with in the House. I would like to ask him a question in that connection.

Mr. BELL. I give as a reason the influence that great, powerful constituents have upon ordinary human beings. I take it that——

Mr. TALBERT. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. BELL. I take it that the Pennsylvania Railroad pretty nearly dominates the politics of Pennsylvania, and that the Burlington pretty nearly dominates the politics of the region through which it goes.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the bill introduced here some time ago by my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES] to prevent any member of Congress from accepting a free pass for himself or any of his family, if it should pass this House—that the railroads would not have quite such a big swing here as they have now? I just ask the gentleman that question and would like for him to answer frankly and plainly.

Mr. BELL. I do not know about that. If you were to disfranchise every railroad attorney and employee and sew up his mouth during the campaign, you might do it, but I do not think the little pass business would cut much figure. It is the influence of a great constituency over the person representing that constituency, to which we are all more or less subject.

Mr. SIBLEY. I hardly think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] really wishes to be understood that the average member of Congress would sell himself for so cheap a price as a pass on a railway.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not take any such position as that, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I only asked the question, and leave the gentleman to such construction as he wishes to place upon it. I do not propose to go into a disquisition on the subject, but really think this phase of the subject deserves some notice.

Mr. BELL. Where we have a great industry or interest, it will have its influence upon the Representatives who come from that part of the country.

Mr. TALBERT. I want to say, if I may be pardoned for doing so, that this House is composed of human beings; and when they and their families are carried all over this country, and even all around the continent, upon soft cushions, without having to pay for it, it certainly has some effect upon them when a question between the people and the railroad company furnishing that soft cushion comes up here in this House for consideration. I will say that much, because they are human beings and are subject to these influences to a certain extent. You can not get around it. In other words, I believe the country would be safer if this free-pass business were broken up entirely. It would at least be better for members to be under no obligations to railroads.

Mr. BELL. Now, I will agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. BINGHAM. How about the free seed business?

Mr. BELL. I agree that if you were to stop all the special favors of every kind to public men from all of these great combinations of capital, you would have a great improvement in your Government.

Mr. TALBERT. The railroads expect an equivalent in some way for favors granted to individuals.

Mr. BELL. I thank you, gentlemen, for your patience, and am sorry that I have consumed so much time. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, there are in this bill several provisions with which I am not in accord, although I did not join in the report of the minority. There are two provisions particularly which open up an almost limitless expenditure of money in the future. One of these is the provision for rural free delivery, the other is the expenditure for the pneumatic-tube service.

Now, in view of the action of this House in the last session, I presume it is useless to attempt to prevent the expenditure of the amount of money proposed in this bill for rural free delivery. We came into the House last year with a bill appropriating $150,000 for experimental rural free delivery. The House doubled the amount and made it $300,000. The committee this year report $1,750,000, or more than five and a half times as much as it carried in the bill for the present year.

I know that at least that $1,750,000 will go through this House. I shall be very agreeably surprised if an effort is not made and successfully made to double that amount or even triple it in this bill. I know how the members of this House feel in regard to this rural free delivery. They feel as they do in regard to the distribution of seed and in regard to the distribution of maps and documents—that it is a good thing with which to make themselves solid with their constituents. And every member of us, with the exception of a few who represent strictly city districts, has a rural community or more in his district to whom he proposes to give rural free delivery if the amount can be increased in this bill sufficiently to warrant the authorities in putting it there.

I want to say that part of my district is a country district, and yet I have not made application to the Post-Office authorities for the establishment of a rural free-delivery route in that district. I believe that rural free delivery should be kept in the experimental stage until it has got far beyond the point at which it now is. The Post-Office authorities, even the most enthusiastic supporters of rural free delivery—and I refer particularly to the First Assistant Postmaster-General—do not concede that the amount of money saved from the discontinuance of star routes and fourth-class offices will in any manner equal or offset the additional expenditure which grows out of this rural free delivery.

Mr. GAINES. Will my friend yield?

Mr. BROMWELL. In a moment. It is not anticipated that it will in the near future, if ever, compensate for the additional expense. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES. I was down at the rural free delivery department this morning, and the officer in charge showed me a manuscript report, which will be published to-morrow, showing that in Carroll County—I don't know where, but somewhere in the United States——

Mr. BROMWELL. In Maryland.

Mr. GAINES. That it had increased the mail-service delivery decidedly, and had saved 23 per cent to the Government. It increased it, and did it at a saving of 23 per cent.

Mr. BROMWELL. That may be true in a particular county, in a particular State; but when you come to go over all the United States, into the sparsely settled sections of the country where this rural free delivery is demanded, you will find that these figures that may apply to a particular county in a particular State, where there have been a number of post-offices discontinued, and a number of star routes also discontinued, that the apparent saving there will not be carried out in other parts of the country.

Mr. GAINES. The Department has informed me where they put in the free-delivery service if it is not self-sustaining it is discontinued.

Mr. BROMWELL. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee knows this: He knows the influence an ordinary member of Congress has upon the Post-Office Department. They want to accommodate you and they want to oblige me, and it will be a rare thing for the Post-Office Department, over my protest or yours, to discontinue rural free delivery where it has once been started, and the gentleman knows that wherever the rural free delivery is once started they will ask greater expenditures rather than have it discontinued.

Mr. GAINES. Would not they have the right to discontinue it wherever the revenues were not sufficient, the same as they do with free delivery in the cities, because it does not pay?

Mr. BROMWELL. That is a very different thing.

Mr. GAINES. They will exercise the same rights in this case.

Mr. BROMWELL. Does not the gentleman know that last year or the year before last a proposition was made to curtail the carrier service because the expenditure of the money was going to use up the amount appropriated for that purpose before the end of the year, and it was proposed to reduce the number of carriers, and every member on this floor that represented a district where there were carriers made such a protest that the Department withdrew its proposition and decided to run the full carrier force until the money was expended, and then came in here and asked for enough money to carry it on to the end of the year, and the House and the Senate passed a bill giving them the money for that purpose?

Mr. GAINES. I do not remember that particular instance.

Mr. BROMWELL. It took place just the same. It is a useless thing for anyone in this House to attempt to oppose this expenditure for rural free delivery, and I shall not waste my time and my breath in any such effort; but I do wish to call attention to the fact when you are entering upon this rural free delivery, if it increases in cost to the Government for in next ten years as it has in the past three, it is not only going to make a deficit of four to six million dollars in the postal revenues, but will make it from forty to sixty or a hundred millions before you get through with it.

Another expenditure which may grow to an indefinite extent is this pneumatic-tube service. I believe with the chairman of the committee, that the pneumatic-tube service ought to have been originally, and ought perhaps to-day, to be put on the same footing as that service of the postal department which expedites the mail delivery by special-delivery stamps. I believe that every piece of mail put into the pneumatic tube ought to have a special-delivery stamp, and then it might pay its way, but when the entire mail, first-class, and, where possible second-class, are sent through the tubes the work that it will do to expedite the mail will be slight and not at all commensurate with its cost.

Now, I know how some of these things are going to turn out. Those who are interested in rural delivery are going to enter into a combination, tacitly, it may be, on the floor in this House, to prevent the defeat of either one of these propositions. They are going to combine with those who are interested in the pneumatic-tube service. They will say to those who live in the cities where the pneumatic-tube service is in existence, we will stand with you for your pneumatic-tube service if you will stay with us for our rural free delivery. They will say they are doing that because it expedites the mail. The hearings before the Post-Office Committee show that the expedition of the mails by the pneumatic-tube service is very slight. Fortunately the appropriation for the pneumatic service this year is still a small amount, and the subject is still within the control of Congress.

Personally I am opposed to any extension of the pneumatic-tube service beyond what has already gone on until some showing is made that there is a valuable acceleration in the delivery of the mail, and that there will some time in the future be a return for it which will make it a profitable investment of the Government's money. Complaints have been made of this bill by the postal clerks, the carriers, and the railway mail clerks that we have not made a provision for the reclassification of those branches of the service.

I want to say that whatever provision has been made for increase of salaries in this bill has been made simply in accordance with the existing law. It would have been impossible to have put into this bill the classification bills that have been proposed without a point of order being made that it was new legislation upon an appropriation bill. Personally, I want to say, that I am in favor of a fair classification in all these branches of the service; and I hope the time will come, possibly at this session, surely at the next session, when the subject of reclassification of these different classes of clerks shall be taken up and agreed upon by the House.

But, gentlemen, there is one subject to which I wish particularly to call your attention to-day, and I do it rather than wait for the limited time I shall have under the five-minute rule, and that is what was alluded to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL], the subsidy for fast mail facilities.

Ever since I have been a member of this House I have raised my voice and cast my vote against this iniquity. Many of you who have served for a number of years are familiar with the subject. I can give you very little new light upon it; the situation is the same to-day as it was eight or ten years ago. The arguments that will be advanced to-morrow in the debate upon this provision of the bill will be the same arguments that have been presented before. We have at different times succeeded in defeating this appropriation in the House, and at other times we have been beaten. There are two of what are called special fast-mail subsidies. One of these is of a number of years' standing. It was put upon the appropriation bill at a time before I became a member. Some years ago there were a number of subsidies given to a number of roads in addition to the regular mail pay, for the purpose of getting them to put on faster trains, and to run according to better schedules and make better connections.

These subsidies were all, one after the other, withdrawn, with the exception of one, which was retained for the purpose of getting the mails from Worcester or Springfield, Mass., down to Tampa, Fla., and for the purpose of expediting the mails to the West Indies. After that subsidy had been granted and used by the railroads for a number of years, it was switched over to a different line of roads, changed from a subsidy to Tampa and the West Indies to one which would carry the mail to New Orleans, and in that form it has remained on the appropriation bill ever since. Originally the amount was $195,000, given, remember, in addition to the regular mail pay, such as every other railroad company in the United States gets for carrying the mail.

Mr. TALBERT. Does not the gentleman recollect that in the last Congress when that question was up there was a statement read from the then Postmaster-General, who sent a message to Congress, saying that he could get just as good mail facilities without the appropriation as he could with it?

Mr. BROMWELL. I not only have that statement, but others in the hearings before the Postal Commission in regard to it.

Mr. TALBERT. And that he said it was wholly unnecessary and a waste of money, because he could get just as good facilities without it.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROMWELL. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. MADDOX. It is right on that line that the gentleman is speaking of.

Mr. BROMWELL. And this is right along on the line that I want to talk about. Perhaps in what I am going to say I shall answer the gentleman's question. Every Postmaster-General from that time down to this has refused to recommend, or to include in his estimate, the amount of this subsidy. In one or two instances they have come out clearly and emphatically against its allowance. They have said to us that they could get just as good service with their trains and run on just as fast time; that the mail would be delivered just as promptly and quickly without the subsidy as with it; and they have also said, as a matter of justice to the other railroads all over the country who are rendering better service and were running faster trains and who are only being paid the regular mail rate, that it was unfair and unjust to them that this special line of roads should be given this special subsidy.

Some two or three years ago there was $25,000 of the original subsidy not being used. The gentleman from the Kansas City district in this House introduced an amendment to the bill, which was ruled out on a point of order, but was afterwards reinserted in the Senate and passed by the House, appropriating the unexpended $25,000 for a new subsidy from Kansas City to Newton, Kans.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman allow me? The bill provided that the $25,000 should be used at the discretion of the Postmaster-General to expedite the mails.

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to say to the gentleman that I was a member of the House and on the committee, and this was urged upon the committee by Mr. Miller, who represented that district at that time, for the purpose of getting it for his district, and it was backed by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Dockery, who was interested in it, and it was on the strength and influence of these two gentlemen that the matter went through.

Mr. COWHERD. I wanted to say that the bill did not provide what line it should be applied to; but I admit that this was the best place to use it.

Mr. BROMWELL. No doubt the gentleman thinks so because he represents that same district to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, during the few minutes left me I want to call attention to some extracts from the hearings before the postal commission.

Mr. MADDOX. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. I yield.

Mr. MADDOX. I have heard this bill discussed here a number of times, and especially this provision for special mail facilities. It has been stated here time and again, just as the gentleman has stated to-day, that the Postmasters-General do not want this appropriation made, and recommend that it be not made. This bill provides, as has been provided for a number of years past, that this appropriation for special mail facilities shall be spent in the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Now, if he is opposed to this expenditure, why does he allow it to be made?

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me answer the gentleman. I expected to reach that point in the course of my remarks, and would have done so without the gentleman's question. But since he has put the question to me, I want to read to him the question put by Mr. MOODY, a member of the Postal Commission, to the Assistant Postmaster-General. The question sounds very much like the one the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] has just put to me. Let me read it.

Isn't the matter discretionary with the Department, even after Congress makes the appropriation?

That is the question, I believe, which the gentleman from Georgia put to me. Here is the answer of the Assistant Postmaster-General:

Well, the Department would have the power to withhold it; but having recommended to Congress the advisability of withholding it, the Department is bound to assume that Congress desires the appropriation to be expended so long as it is made.

That is the theory on which the Post-Office Department has acted year after year. When the Department says to us, "We do not want this appropriation; it does not do us any good; we can get good service without it; it is a gratuity which we are giving to this railroad." When they come here and tell us that, and yet every year we appropriate $171,000 to be expended in behalf of this system of railroads, what can the Department do but assume that we are giving them an instruction to spend this $171,000? Although the provision in this bill makes it discretionary with the Postmaster-General whether the expenditure shall be made, that is the theory on which the Post-Office Department has always spent the money that we appropriated.

When the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was before the postal commission, referring to the subject of the fast-mail subsidy from Kansas City to Newton, Kans., this question was asked:

Q. Do you believe that the Government received greater returns from the expenditure of the money upon this road than it would receive had it been devoted to any other road in the United States?

A. I do not believe that it receives any greater returns from expenditures on this road than it would on any other road in the country.

Q. Do you believe that it receives as great advantages as it would have received from some others?

A. I am not prepared at this moment positively to say so, but my impression is that there are roads in the country over which greater returns would have been received.

Q. A greater amount of mail could have been expedited, and mail could have been expedited to a greater extent then it is upon this road?

A. Yes.

Then he quotes from a report made to him by Alexander Grant, acting superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, which was prepared at his request upon this subject. This is the report:

There seems to be no justification for the special-facilities payment, judging from results obtained. If we treated all lines on this basis, then we should pay the Northwestern Railroad for running an early morning train from Chicago at 3.45 a. m. to Fort Howard, Wis.; also for Cedar Rapids from Chicago. We should also pay the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railroad for a train leaving Chicago at the same hour and running to Marion and the West; also the same road for a train from Chicago to Milwaukee and St. Paul; the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy for a train leaving Chicago at 3 a. m. and running to Burlington and Omaha; the Monon Route for a train leaving Chicago in the early morning for Cincinnati. The Illinois Central also has a train leaving Chicago about the same hour, as has also the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago and the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern.

The Missouri Pacific runs a train out of St. Louis at 3 o'clock in the morning; so does the Iron Mountain; also the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern; the Pennsylvania for Indianapolis and the East, and the Wabash for Toledo and the East. The Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern also runs a train out of Cincinnati about the same hour. The Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton also has a train out of Cincinnati at about 3 a. m. The Michigan Central runs a train out of Detroit about the same hour; so does the Flint and Pere Marquette.

From this it can be seen that the railroad companies can be induced to run trains at an hour not calculated to draw passenger traffic, but mainly for the interest of the mails. All of these early morning trains have been secured without special-facilities payment.

In 1893 the Department discontinued the special-facilities appropriation for the Atlantic Coast Line from New York, by way of Washington, Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah, to Jacksonville, but Congress, without any recommendation from the Department, made an appropriation for improved facilities between New York and New Orleans by way of Philadelphia, Washington, Charlotte, Montgomery, and Mobile. There is no question but that the service was improved between New York and New Orleans, but whether the improvements could not have been secured without the payment of special-facilities money is an open question. We can only judge by what has been accomplished in other directions.

In 1894 the Department secured a special fast mail on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railroad, leaving St. Louis at 3 a. m. and running on fast time to Texarkana, making connection with the Texas and Pacific, and thus reaching nearly all of the central points in Texas. At that time the company was running two through trains daily, one leaving St. Louis at 10 a. m. and arriving at Texarkana at 8.15 a. m. the next day, the other leaving St. Louis at 8.15 p. m. and reaching Texarkana at 1.20 p. m. the next day. The new fast-mail train left St. Louis at 3.05 a. m. and arrived at Texarkana at 9.30 p. m. and was clearly additional service. The speed of this train is about 30 miles an hour, including stops.

In 1890 the Illinois Central, at the solicitation of the Department, put on a train out of Chicago leaving at 3 p. m. and running through to New Orleans. This train was in addition to service then operating and was secured solely on account of the additional business which would accrue from the improved facilities. This train makes a speed of 36 miles an hour, including stops, from Chicago to Cairo, and 30 miles an hour, including stops, from Cairo to New Orleans.

As an evidence that special-facilities money is not necessary to enable railroads in the South to operate fast trains, I would cite the fact that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad maintains two through trains daily between Cincinnati and New Orleans in addition to trains for local service. These through trains make a speed of 33 and 28 miles, respectively, including stops.

The Queen and Crescent system, which competes with the Louisville and Nashville between Cincinnati and New Orleans, also runs two trains daily between Cincinnati and New Orleans, which are run at a speed of 31 and 32 miles an hour, respectively, including stops.

The Florida Central and Peninsular, which competes with the Atlantic Coast Line for Florida business, runs two through trains a day to Columbia and Jacksonville. The Atlantic Coast Line has not reduced its train service in consequence of the withdrawal of the special-facilities payment, but still maintains two through trains daily, in connection with the Pennsylvania and other lines interested, between New York and Jacksonville, and during the heavy business in the winter time puts on a special fast train in addition.

The Postmaster-General was then asked:

Is not the tendency where we give subsidies to one line for the others to ask or expect the same kind of payment?

A. The tendency is to produce a discontent and dissatisfaction, if not hesitancy, on the part of other roads in giving us similar service without a special appropriation. I will say that that has not interfered to prevent our increasing special mail facilities from East to West. We have been able, as this table indicates, in almost every instance to secure an early morning train leading out of the great cities, perhaps because it is easier for us to secure what we wish over roads that carry an immense volume of other traffic. Therefore we should find it difficult to secure through the Southern section of the country as great speed perhaps as we are securing in the North; for instance, to Atlanta, and between Atlanta and New Orleans. But as I have said in my testimony before, looking the country over, and knowing the dissatisfaction it creates, we are prepared to say that we think we can secure in general better service without the special-facilities appropriation.

One of the claims, I may interject right here, is that they start their through train out of New York at an hour when they can not hope to have any passenger traffic, and therefore that they make a concession to the postal service in this connection. But you will notice, Mr. Chairman, in this table to which I refer that all of these trains referred to by Mr. Grant start about 3 o'clock in the morning, when they could not hope or would not expect to have heavy passenger traffic.

This testimony goes on to state what has been done in reference to other roads, or on other roads where subsidies were granted, and shows that whether the subsidies were granted or otherwise the service was pretty good. In other words, that there was no advantage gained by the granting of the subsidy. And the statement is made in the hearings here that the service would have been probably as good as it is to-day without the subsidy. In other words, that we not only pay the regular rate for the carrying of the mails, but make an unnecessary appropriation for giving these roads $171,000 in addition. That is the sum and substance of it and that is the point I am making now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question was asked during the hearings as to whether these roads might not take the fast trains off if the subsidy were withdrawn. Gentlemen, when we hear on the floor of the House members from the Southern States telling us of the prosperity of that region—a prosperity that has struck that portion of the country during recent years, and in which we all rejoice, and in which no man rejoices more than myself—when we hear our friends from the South telling of the prosperity of that region, the manufacturing establishments that are starting and in existence, we do not find that these are dependent upon the subsidies granted to the different roads, and we can not feel that a line of railroad running from New York to Philadelphia and Washington and down the coast to the extreme South and along the Gulf coast needs a subsidy, which at one time might have been necessary, but which, in view of the prosperity of the Southern region, is no longer needed to keep the road in operation.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not a fact, though, that just about as many members from the South voted against the subsidy as voted for it?

Mr. BROMWELL. I am not criticising those who voted for it, nor those who voted against it. I am merely trying to show you that whatever might have been necessary when this subsidy was originally granted, it is no longer necessary to keep this subsidy upon our appropriation bill, because these railroads are prosperous and are making money out of their legitimate mail rates, out of their freight rates, out of their express business, and out of their passenger traffic.

Mr. KLEBERG. I agree with the gentleman entirely, and think it is a totally unnecessary appropriation, but I thought the criticism of the Southern members was unjust.

Mr. BROMWELL. I was not criticising the Southern members. I was merely saying that when the members from the South made statements as to the prosperity of the country that we all rejoiced in it, and that it was an argument to us that these subsidies were no longer necessary. Now, I am glad to be able to say that a number of Southern members—three of them on the Post-Office Committee, who joined in the minority report in opposition to the subsidy—have repeatedly voted against this iniquity, as I hope they will now do when this bill comes up for final vote.

Mr. GAINES. That is a subsidy to what railroad?

Mr. BROMWELL. A subsidy to a system of railroads made up of the Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia and Wilmington, the Southern Railroad, the Alabama and West Point Railroad, and the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, all forming a system of connecting roads, starting at New York and ending at New Orleans, which divide up this subsidy among themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, there are a few additional notes that I should like to insert in the RECORD. I must return this book of hearings, because, as the chairman says, it has a chain to it, but I will, with the consent of the House, add these other notes to my remarks as printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has twenty minutes remaining, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has twenty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. MOON. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague [Mr. GAINES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

[Mr. GAINES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY].

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the subject under discussion at this late hour is the Post-Office appropriation bill. I have no extended remarks to make in support of the action of the committee in reporting this bill.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether he means to confine himself to the subject.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will attempt to do so as closely as possible. At least I will do so as closely as some gentlemen who have occupied the time here to-day.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, we have under consideration the Post-Office appropriation bill. I believe that every member of the Post-Office Committee has worked earnestly, diligently, and, I believe it is fair to say, intelligently in the preparation of the measure and the report accompanying it.

I trust my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] will not think that I am wandering from the topic legitimately under consideration if I call the attention of the few members of the House who are at this moment present to the fact that I believe we are engaged in the commercial conquest of the world with the products of our American genius and our American industry; and therefore every provision in this bill which works for that purpose commands my cordial assent. Anything which expedites communication, anything which gives thought, intelligent thought, wider scope, whether it be free rural delivery, pneumatic-tube service, or the expedition of the mails on our railway lines, commands my cordial support.

We are in an era to-day when from the South we are getting 9-cent cotton. And while within the last few minutes I have heard something about the "suffering people," I think the people who are getting 9 cents instead of 4 cents a pound for their cotton are not "suffering" as they were at the 4-cent price. Up in my country we are getting $16 for hemlock lumber. A few years ago we could not sell it for $6. In Alabama pig iron now commands $20 a ton; and a few years ago your yards were stacked full of it, unsalable at $7 a ton. We are now exporting those products.

In Pennsylvania, Ohio, Virginia, West Virginia we are mining coal for export to almost every country of Europe. The men who are digging that coal receive therefor a greater sum per ton than the owner of the mine received for the ton of coal two or three years ago. Those acquainted with the situation inform me that coal to-day is commanding 21 shillings on the docks at Havre, France, a raise in price of 10 shillings per ton in the last three years.

Germany, France, Italy, Spain, and even Great Britain will yet be consumers of American coal. James J. Hill, the president of the Great Northern Railroad, in an interview published only a few weeks since, stated that he was building two steamers for the oriental trade, either one of which would be more than double the capacity of the greatest vessels on the Atlantic Ocean, and that the demand for American wheat and American cotton in the Orient at the present was limited alone by the cargo capacity on the Pacific Ocean.

China is having railroads extended through her length and breadth, where our trade has never permeated more than 10 miles inside the fringe of the seaboard ports, and now 450,000,000 people, with their multiplied wants, are demanding our products.

With cargo capacity ample and with the extension of these railway lines it is estimated that China alone will consume every bushel of our surplus product of wheat at an advance of over 60 per cent of the present price, and then feed her teeming millions with the cheapest and most nutritious food possible for the sustenance of human life.

Corn has advanced from 29 cents to about 40 cents a bushel, and the demand from Europe has steadily increased. The farmer has been in the valley of humiliation for twenty-five years, but he is now about to assume his proper place as the king among men; and the value in farm lands and farm products consequent upon the great increase in the world's product of gold and the demand from the Orient through the opening up of those markets will afford the American farmer that reward for his efforts which has been so scanty and inadequate in the past as to drive him to the verge of bankruptcy and ruin.

I do not believe this is an age when anyone can set himself in front of the wheels of progress and leave anything but a great big grease spot as the result of his efforts. Any measure which makes it easier for us to transact business with a foreign country—whether it be the pneumatic tube or the fast mail or the rural delivery—I am going to support so long as I am a member of this body.

The subsidy for fast mails to the South has been attacked here. The hearings before the Post-Office Committee showed that it reduced the time of delivery of the mails to the merchants of New Orleans fifteen hours and a corresponding reduction to all points en route.

The Seaboard Air Line had that subsidy and refused longer to carry the mail for that price and asked to be relieved of it. Under pressure the Southern Railroad system took that service and gave to the people of Texas and South Carolina, with their cotton factories and other industries just developing, the opportunity to compete with the people of New England. A day means more now in the transaction of business than a month did fifty years ago. The pneumatic-tube service has been attacked.

Mr. BROMWELL. Before the gentleman starts on the pneumatic-tube service, may I ask him a question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Go ahead, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. You say the subsidy to the Southern line has expedited the mails fifteen hours?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not agree that that is correct; but assuming that that is true, you are making a comparison of the speed at which trains now run with the speed at which they ran a number of years ago, when this subsidy was first granted, I presume. Now, I want to ask this question: Suppose that this subsidy was taken away from this fast mail line, so called, does the gentleman mean to say to this House that it would take fifteen hours longer, under present conditions and in the present day, to get the mail from New York to New Orleans than it now does with this subsidy granted to this road?

Mr. SIBLEY. I mean to say absolutely yes, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] showed it to you before the committee when you objected to this, and proved it by the time table. That fast mail train makes but two stops in going the whole length of the State of Virginia. It leaves New York at 4 o'clock in the morning, when people will not get up to take the train to the South. Its primary object is to carry the fast mail, and there is not a city south of this capital that is not benefited, nor a commercial community, nor a manufacturer, and I do not believe a cotton grower, that does not receive his commensurate proportion of benefit.

Mr. BROMWELL. Are there not other roads in this country that run their trains long distances without stopping and which do not get any subsidy?

Mr. SIBLEY. Very true; but they do not run through such a sparsely settled country as these trains do. Now, I have no selfish interest in the people of the South. My friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] will speak upon this subject, and he is able to answer your questions, and I want you to ask him, because I greatly enjoyed his answers that he made to you before the committee. He is better posted than I am on that.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will ask him.

Mr. SIBLEY. I just referred to that incidentally as one of the things I am in favor of, because it is giving enlarged opportunity to the people of the South and Southwest.

I do not live in one of the great cities where the pneumatic-tube service will benefit me directly, but I am doing business with every State and Territory in this Union. I am doing business with practically every country in South America, and some abroad, and if I send a letter to-day to New York, it makes a difference whether it reaches a steamer that goes out Wednesday or has to lie in New York until next Saturday.

In the hearings before the Postal Committee the postmasters of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, where this service is established, state that it made a difference of hours in the delivery of letters. The process is continuous. As the mail comes into the station it goes through these tubes to the post-office in seven minutes, while to go from Forty-second street down to the post-office in New York City, in the congested condition of the traffic there, requires anywhere from an hour to an hour and a half. The mail goes there ready to go to the carrier and he takes it out, and the man gets his morning mail in time for the day's business.

The same thing is true as to outgoing mail. There is no accumulation. The mail goes continuously through that tube, and a man can post a letter seven minutes before the time of departure of a train and have the letter reach its destination promptly, whether it be in Texas or Chicago. It was shown by the testimony of the postmaster of Chicago that they have at the stock yards a business of tremendous magnitude, which now can only reach the post-office in from an hour and one-half to two hours. It would make the journey in seven or eight minutes by pneumatic tube.

The proposition was made by the Pneumatic Tube Company to put that service complete into 27 of the largest cities of this Union for $2,500,000, including the cost now paid for wagon service by the Government of the United States, amounting to $900,000. I believe the smallest city that was embraced in the proposition was Atlanta, Ga. Under that service the substations of every great city would have the pneumatic tubes, and instead of sending the mail by street car or wagon the mail would be expedited from one to four hours, according to the number of deliveries made. Therefore I am in favor of it.

If we want to control the markets of the world we must be able to communicate with them as cheaply and as quickly as anybody else. You may go into the great office buildings of the city of New York and see what private enterprise does with the pneumatic tube. A man can not wait to send a messenger up the elevator, but there are pneumatic tubes to every office, and the man claps his message or his document into the tube and it is carried to the thirteenth or fifteenth or seventeenth story of that commercial establishment. Men are moving a little bit faster to-day than they moved a hundred years ago.

Mr. LOUD. Why do you not exhibit that picture?

Mr. SIBLEY. I just want to speak of one point that was brought out here in the sworn testimony taken before the Senate committee about the matter of railway compensation. It has been said in this House that the amount paid by the Government to the Erie Railroad for transportation of mails has been sufficient to pay a dividend of 6 per cent per annum upon all the stock of that road. The stock of that road is $150,000,000. Six per cent per annum would be $9,000,000, while the highest sum ever paid by the United States Government to the Erie Railroad has been $500,000 a year for carrying the mails; and this upon about 2,200 miles of road. That shows the recklessness of the statements in which gentlemen indulge when discussing these measures.

Again, it was said that the great railroads of the Eastern States to-day receive 5 to 6 per cent on $60,000 per mile of their road on Government contracts for carrying the mails alone. In the six New England States there are 7,100 miles of railway, which, at $60,000 per mile, would amount to $425,000,000. Five per cent of that sum would be $21,000,000, and the aggregate mail pay for all the New England States is only $1,670,000, or less than one-fifteenth of the amount so stated.

Now, there has been exaggeration and misstatement somewhere, and we have got to deal with plain facts and can not allow our prejudices to take the place of our reason in dealing with a business proposition. On the roads in the State of Massachusetts, where there are 76 railway mail routes, 52 carry less than 1,000 pounds of mail per day, covering 487 miles. These roads cost $29,000,000, based on the cost, stated by these gentlemen, of $60,000 a mile. On the figures given by these gentlemen the total mail compensation should amount to $1,460,000. The total amount received by these railroads is exactly $35,000, instead of $1,460,000.

I sent down to the Post-Office Committee and had brought up here something that illustrates the position of some of our friends. Here is a picture which shows the mail carrier of one hundred years ago, traveling on horseback over a corduroy road, and here below is a picture of a great fast mail train. Any man who likes the old style may go back to it if he will, as far I am concerned.

There are gentlemen here who will argue that the corduroy and the man on horseback furnish the truer way to do business. And Democrats on the floor of this House will oppose this bill, and I do not know but what Republicans are going to do the same thing. Gentlemen, it will not do. Any man who wants the corduroy road ought to have it, if that is fast enough for him; but I tell you you do not find this fast mail train, equipped as it is to-day and running from 53 to 80 miles an hour, any too fast for the people who are doing the business of the country at the present moment.

Mr. KLEBERG. Who got up that picture, the railroad company or the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SIBLEY. I suppose the railroad company got it up; but that does not make any difference. If you prefer this way, you may advocate it. I want the other, because I want to give the people the benefit of the best possible service.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman think that if we do not make appropriations for pneumatic-tube service we will do away with the railroads?

Mr. BROMWELL. Or does the gentleman contend that if we do not give $170,000 in the way of a special subsidy to the Southern Railway system that they are going to take off that beautiful fast train of theirs?

Mr. SIBLEY. I believe, sir, that you can not make a reduction of 25 per cent of the compensation of the railroads for transporting the mail without getting a less percentage of efficiency. I do not believe that you can go to California in a Pullman car as cheap as you can in a tourist car.

You can go there without paying anything and have a bunk all the way, or you ride in the palace car at $5 a day; and if you take away the compensation to railroads, while by law you may force them to accept a lesser sum, possibly, if you do, you have no law that will compel them to run their trains at 50 or 80 miles an hour, as they do on some of the roads at the present time.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is it not a fact that there are roads, a number of roads, all over this country, that are not getting extra pay in the way of subsidy pay that run faster trains, and are expediting the mails more than on this Southern system?

Mr. SIBLEY. Possibly that is true; and if so, it is not any argument. The gentleman knows it is no argument. The conditions are varied. Trains run from New York to Chicago and from Chicago to New York any hour of the twenty-four that you please and get passengers, but when you run through the South you have got only two trains daily. If it was profitable, why did the Seaboard Air Line refuse to continue the contract longer?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman deny that there are lines of railroads running through the South, through sections of country that are as sparsely settled as this, that carry trains just as rapidly as the train that is under consideration? Take the Illinois Central, a road running from Chicago down to New Orleans. When it strikes the South it runs through a country of about the same density of population. Does it not run trains just as fast as this system that is subsidized?

Mr. BROMWELL. Take the Cincinnati Southern, that runs from Cincinnati to New Orleans. But even supposing you say that this is in a sparsely settled country, why should we subsidize these trains from New York down to Washington? Yet we subsidize the train that runs between New York City and which comes by way of Philadelphia and Baltimore to Washington.

Mr. SIBLEY. But it comes in the beginning from east of there. It catches the trains from New England. We compel this train to leave New York at 4 o'clock, when not even the gentleman from Ohio would like to take a train; and they must deliver their mail at a certain time or be fined or lose the entire compensation if the train is late.

In running through the State of Virginia they are allowed to make but two stops. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] will answer you any question about that, as he is familiar with it. So as to be able to give that service in the State of Virginia they only stop twice, and they abandon their passenger traffic; and we found that the Seaboard Air Line gave up the contract and refused to take it longer, because they could not do it without loss.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman has said once or twice that the Seaboard Air Line used to have this subsidy, as it is called.

Mr. SIBLEY. They did.

Mr. KITCHIN. My recollection is that the Seaboard Air Line never had it.

Mr. SIBLEY. The Atlantic Coast Line.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think if the gentleman will take the trouble to go down and look at the time-tables at the Pennsylvania depot, he will find that the Seaboard Air Line runs a train from Washington to Atlanta upon just as good a schedule time as this. I think there is about five minutes difference.

Mr. SIBLEY. I meant that the Atlantic Coast Line had this contract and refused to take it longer. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has the testimony on this point, and I am trenching somewhat upon his preserves in referring to it, and should not have done so if the matter had not been brought up by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KITCHIN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Seaboard Air Line never had it.

Mr. SIBLEY. I meant to say the Atlantic Coast Line. It was a mere lapsus lingua.

Mr. KITCHIN. That train leaves at 2 o'clock in the evening, while the other train does not leave at that time.

Mr. SIBLEY. It leaves the city of New York at 4.25 a. m.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I say to the gentleman, not as a question, but just to remind him—I know he is amiable about being interrupted—the gentleman does not recollect the reading of the report by Mr. Grant, who stated in effect that there were twelve or fifteen large railway systems which run trains out West at 3 and half past 2 in the morning, and the same argument of running a train out of New York at 4 o'clock in the morning—that they could not get passengers—will apply to the twelve or fifteen large railway systems running their trains out of Chicago, Cincinnati, and other places, that they could get no passengers, and yet they get no subsidy.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am going to let the gentleman from Virginia answer you. I do not think there is any analogy between the cases. It is an entirely different country. I have got no interest in it except the interest that every citizen has—to see the opportunities for rapid service, rapid communication and facilities to do their business given to the South, as well as it is to the most favored parts of this nation.

I believe the South has entered into a new era of progress and of commercial industry, and that her future in certain lines of manufacturing development and industry is boundless, if her statesmen will give her commercial interests the opportunity to expand and find the wide markets of the world. It is evident to all that the United States is entering into a new epoch, and that the seat of commercial and financial empire is to be located upon this continent.

We exported last year $339,000,000 of the products of our workshops and factories. Each month shows a gain running into the millions, and unless we by unwise political action and the cultivation of a narrow and petty prejudice hinder and arrest development wise observers and students of economics state that within six years the value of our exports of manufactured products alone will reach one thousand million dollars. This means practically the doubling of the entire manufacturing energies of our nation.

Shall we delay, hinder, or possibly prevent this by wrapping about ourselves our narrow garments of prejudice and partisanship and button those garments about us so tight that we do not dare to straighten up and take a breath of God's free air for fear we burst the buttons off these garments?

In this present age it will not even do for us to stand still. The watchword of the hour is "Forward!" and it is strange to find in this representative body those who not only propose to stand still, but would turn our faces backward. The corduroy road and the saddlebags for the dawn of the nineteenth century, but the fast mail and the wings of lightning for the dawn of the twentieth.

The plain people of America, as well as the leaders in the commercial world who are at work on these great problems, all proportionately enjoy the benefits springing from the bettered conditions, and I desire to see these people who are engaged in this great production and export trade, which they carry from our shores as a trophy of American genius, have the opportunity, whether residing in the North or South, the East or the West, to enjoy any advantage and every advantage that will expedite and increase their business, that will convey intelligence and give a wider realm to higher thought and action. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] opposes rural free delivery; he has not got any in Cincinnati.

Mr. BROMWELL. I have one in my district.

Mr. SIBLEY. I have not got any in my district, but I hope to have some, and when they do I hope they will not be any more expensive to the Government than the letter-carrier system in Cincinnati, but it will take the place of the present star route, and the Government will be the gainer. No rural free delivery will be maintained which will not add to rather than detract from the revenues of the Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10301) making appropriations for the postal service, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with accompanying communications, draft of a bill for the establishment of a national standardizing bureau—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Acting Paymaster-General relating to pay of additional paymasters' clerks—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics submitting an estimate of appropriation for increased clerical assistance—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Architect submitting an estimate of appropriation for improvement and repairs of custom-house and post-office building at Albany, N. Y.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with the draft of a proposed bill, a statement of facts relating to negotiations for purchase of certain groves of Sequoia gigantea in California—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1900.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. DAVIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved, without objection.

JORGE CRUZ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 21st instant, certain information relative to what action has been taken by the Attorney-General in the case of Jorge Cruz, a resident of Porto Rico, alleged to have been brought into this country under a contract to labor in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSIONED NAVAL OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, a statement prepared by the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, giving the total number of commissioned naval officers on the 31st day of December, 1899, the number on shore duty, etc.; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO NAVY-YARDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 2d instant, a tabulated statement showing the number of commissioned officers on duty at each navy-yard and naval station in the United States during the month of March, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WAR-REVENUE RECEIPTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 20th instant, a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue showing the amount of revenue derived from the so-called war-revenue law, so far as it is practicable to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. As the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], at whose request the resolution was passed, is not present, I move that the communication and accompanying papers lie on the table and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a petition of J. B. Sackett Post, No. 320, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Prairieville, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of the Niles District Ministerial Association, of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of the Epworth League, and of the Public Worship, all of Union City, in the State Michigan, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Presbyterian Church of Evart, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Alaska, Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and Cuba, and also for the reenactment of the nullified anti-canteen law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Trades League of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to diminish the deficit in the Postal Department by the adoption of 1-cent letter postage; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Wage Earners' League of Municipal Progress of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to promote the commerce and increase the foreign trade of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 4322) for the relief of the legal representatives of William H. Hays, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4323) for the relief of acting assistant surgeons, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LODGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 118) to set apart the 12th day of February in each year upon which to celebrate the birthday of Abraham Lincoln; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of one clerk to department, navy-yard, Boston, Mass., from $1,300 to $1,400, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment providing that all honorably discharged officers, acting assistant surgeons, and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army of the United States shall be entitled to the benefits of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ELENDER HERRING.

Mr. BAKER. I offer a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return Senate bill 1265, granting a pension to Elender Herring, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate No. 1265, "granting a pension to Elender Herring."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 5296) establishing terms of the United States circuit court at Newbern and Elizabeth City, N. C.; and

A bill (H. R. 6808) to amend an act authorizing the terms of the district court of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi to be held hereafter at Biloxi.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 7945) to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the building of a dam across Rainy Lake River;" and

A bill (H. R. 8962) to authorize the New Orleans and Northwestern Railway Company, its successors and assigns, to build and maintain a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, in the State of Louisiana.

The bill (H. R. 4468) to authorize the city of Tucson, Ariz., to issue bonds for waterworks, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 9496) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Buford abandoned military reservation, in the States of North Dakota and Montana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESERVOIR SITES IN WYOMING AND COLORADO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 10) providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of House Document No. 141, relating to the preliminary examination of reservoir sites in Wyoming and Colorado.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out all after line 7 down to and including line 10 and to insert:

Thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am authorized by the Committee on Printing to move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMISSIONS APPOINTED BY THE EXECUTIVE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], coming over from a previous day. It has been read.

Mr. DAVIS. It has been read. I suggest an amendment to the resolution, in line 5, to strike out "1897" and insert "1885."

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. HALE. What is the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution calling for information about commissions appointed by the President.

Mr. CHANDLER. And it has been amended to go back to 1885.

Mr. HALE. It is a resolution coming over from yesterday morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to amend the resolution by inserting, after the word "compensation," in line 9, the words "or allowance."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to make the modification. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate, first, what commissions have been created or appointed by the Executive or under his authority since March 4, 1885, in reference to the foreign relations of the Territories of the United States or to inquire into the conduct of the late war with Spain; second, the names of the persons composing each of said commissions; third, the total compensation or allowance paid each of said commissioners; fourth, the total compensation paid each of the secretaries, clerks, and other employees of each of said commissions, and fifth, the total traveling, incidental, and other expenses of each of said commissions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] for a moment.

REGULATIONS FOR LOGS AND RAFTS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9824) authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War shall have power, and is hereby authorized and directed, to prescribe rules and regulations to govern the floating of loose timber and logs, and sack rafts, so called, of timber and logs and general navigation, on any one or all of the navigable rivers or waterways of the United States, wherever in his judgment such regulations are necessary to equitably adjust and govern the conflicting interests of logging and other forms of navigation; and such regulations, when so prescribed and published, shall have the force of law, and any violation thereof shall be a misdemeanor, and every person convicted of a violation thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $2,500 nor less than $500, or by imprisonment (in the case of a natural person) for not less than thirty days nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the proper action to enforce the provisions of this section may be commenced before any commissioner, judge, or court of the United States, and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in the case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War may, at any time, alter or modify any rules and regulations prescribed by him under the provisions of this act; and he may rescind such rules and regulations whenever in his judgment the necessity for their continuance no longer exists.

SEC. 3. That whenever rules and regulations shall have been prescribed by the Secretary of War for any waterway, in pursuance of section 1 of this act, and until such rules and regulations shall have been rescinded by his order, the said waterway shall be exempt from the prohibition contained in section 15 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1899, against floating loose timber and logs, or what is known as sack rafts of timber and logs, in streams or channels actually navigated by steamboats.

SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time is hereby reserved.

SEC. 5. That this act shall not, nor shall any rules or regulations prescribed thereunder, in any manner affect any civil action or actions heretofore commenced and now pending to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by reason of the violation of any of the terms of said section 15 of the act of March 3, 1899, as originally enacted, or in violation of any other law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs and rafts on navigable waters."

GOVERNMENT FOR PORTO RICO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes."

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, after line 13, to insert the following additional sections:

SEC. 2. That all franchises, privileges, or concessions mentioned in section 32 of said act shall be approved by the President of the United States, and no such franchise, privilege, or concession shall be operative until it shall have been so approved.

SEC. 3. That all charters granting any franchises, privileges, or concessions mentioned in section 32 of said act to private corporations shall provide that the same shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal; shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds, except in exchange for actual cash, or property at a fair valuation, equal in amount to the par value of the stock or bonds issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends; and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof and for the purchase or taking by the public authorities of their property at a fair valuation. No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currency, or of engaging in agriculture, or permitted to hold or own real estate, except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it was created. Banking corporations, however, may be authorized to loan funds upon real-estate security, and to purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title. Corporations other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

Mr. FORAKER. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution, and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FORAKER, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the Senate in my discussion of the validity of the executive appointment of Matthew S. Quay as a United States Senator from Pennsylvania any longer than can be avoided. I feel that the able arguments which have been made upon both sides of this question by Senators who have served for years upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and who are familiar with the debates and discussions upon the subject to a far greater degree than I can possibly be, place me at a disadvantage. At the same time I believe that I owe a duty to the great constituency which I represent in this Senate to express my views upon this question of constitutional interpretation, and to call the attention of the Senate to certain facts pertaining to the case. As there is a disposition on the part of those who dispute the validity of various executive appointments of Senators to indulge in refinement of differences and distinctions among the various cases they may see fit to approve or disapprove, it will be useful to recall to the attention of the Senate the facts in the present case.

The full term of the Hon. Matthew Stanley Quay, senior United States Senator from Pennsylvania, expired on the 3d day of March, 1899, while the legislature was still in session. By the provisions of article 2, section 4, of the constitution of Pennsylvania the general assembly shall meet at 12 o'clock on the first Tuesday of January every second year, and accordingly the legislature met upon the first Tuesday of January, 1899. At the beginning of the session, in order to expedite the legislative business and to economize in the expenditure of public funds, a concurrent resolution was offered in the senate fixing the time for final adjournment on the 20th day of April following. This resolution unanimously passed both houses. It then became a standing rule of the legislature, and, under our parliamentary practice, could not be changed except by a two-thirds vote. Pursuant to a published call, signed by the chairman of the Republican caucuses of the senate and the house of representatives, respectively, the same having been issued at the customary time and place and by the officials and in the manner prescribed by the party regulations, a joint caucus of the Republican members of the senate and house of representatives was held January 3, 1899, for the purpose of nominating a person to be voted for as the Republican candidate for the office of United States Senator.

At this caucus several candidates were voted for, but Senator Quay, having received 98 out of the 109 Republican votes present, was unanimously declared the caucus nominee of the Republican party. Under the act of assembly of January 11, 1867, reaffirming the similar act of Congress of July 25, 1866, regulating the election of United States Senators, the legislature proceeded to ballot on the third Tuesday of January, 1899. Upon the following day the members of the two houses convened in joint assembly, and it appearing upon the reading of the journal of each house that the same person had not received a majority of the votes in each house, as required by the act of assembly aforesaid, the joint assembly then proceeded to chose a person for the office of United States Senator, and continued to ballot each succeeding day until the legislature adjourned on the 20th day of April, as required by the resolution aforesaid. Inasmuch as none of the candidates received a majority of the votes cast, no election resulted. On the first ballot taken in the joint assembly, Quay, Republican, received 112 votes; Jenks, Democrat, 82; leaving scattering and absent, 60.

On account of members and senators absent and not sworn in, it required 126 votes to make the majority necessary to elect. In this manner the balloting proceeded day after day until the close of the session, Quay receiving the support of the regular Republicans, Jenks, of all the Democrats, and the other senators and members dividing their strength among the various candidates. Seventy-nine ballots had been taken when the legislature adjourned without day on the date above mentioned. On the 21st day of April, 1899, the legislature having adjourned and a vacancy in the office of United States Senator existing by reason of the failure of the legislature to elect, the governor, believing that the State was entitled to a full representation in the Senate under the provisions of section 2 of Article II of the Federal Constitution, appointed Mr. Quay to fill the vacancy until the next meeting of the legislature.

The question at issue is purely one of constitutional interpretation, "Is this a legal appointment?" or, in other words, the question is, "Can a vacancy which is caused by the expiration of a Senatorial term, and which takes place during the session of the legislature, be filled by executive appointment?" The determination of the question depends entirely upon the construction of the brief and concise provisions in the Constitution regarding the appointment of United States Senators. The question has been exhaustively discussed upon similar occasions in this Senate. It has often been affected by partisanship and by the peculiar exigencies of particular cases. In the mass of technical and subtle refinements and distinctions to which the simple words of the Constitution have been subjected, the meaning of these words to a certain extent seems to have become involved in obscurity and doubt. It is becoming apparent, however, that the progressive, common-sense interpretation of this question has become more and more predominant in sustaining the validity of executive appointments to fill Senatorial vacancies whenever a vacancy may occur.

The provisions of the Constitution relating to the Senate of the United States read as follows:

Article I, section 3:
(1) The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.
(2) Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Let us read carefully each succeeding word in the two clauses of the Constitution quoted above, without prejudice, and without predetermined theory, in a spirit of fairness and of common sense, and a recognition of the paramount purpose of their provisions, and I feel confident that we can come to but one conclusion. That conclusion is that the purpose of the Constitution of the United States was to create a Senate, and in the constitution of that Senate is involved the principle that the Senate should be kept filled, and that each individual Senatorial office should be filled, in order that the integrity of the body might be preserved; and to effect this admitted purpose two methods of filling Senatorships were provided for by the Constitution. The first method is by an election by the legislature, which election fills either the whole Senatorial term or the full remainder of any Senatorial term. Secondly, in case of vacancies, for whatever cause, the fact of the vacancy being alone required, existing when the legislature is not in session, the governor may fill such vacancies by temporary appointment. Thus there are two classes of Senatorial appointments, one for the full term by the election of the legislature, and the other, temporary in its character, until the legislature meets and acts. Both are separate and distinct in their spheres, conflict in no wise, and together form a complete system for keeping the Senate filled. I believe also as we proceed to consider the words in the Constitution and recall the history of their interpretation, we shall be struck with this fact, that in numerous instances these words have been interpreted and even strained in their interpretation in order to carry out this admitted purpose of the Constitution, to avoid chasms in the representation of the Senate and to keep it filled.

No more important and impressive lesson could be learned than to consider the several cases to which I shall refer, in which this liberal, and even strained, interpretation has been adopted for the consummation of this paramount purpose. There has been a progressive development of constitutional interpretation steadily tending toward this end, and the last point for contention left to those who by technicality and refinement would obstruct this purpose is the ground upon which objection is made to the present credentials, that appointments can not be made when the vacancy occurs during the session of a legislature which had an opportunity to fill it. One further ground, also, not involved in this case, still remains, and that is that the power of executive appointment is exhausted in one performance of it. I feel confident that in the end the decision and the practice of this Senate will be to complete the progress of constitutional interpretation and recognize that all vacancies may be filled when the legislature is not in session, and that the exercise of the power of executive appointment can be repeated as often as vacancies occur. The most lucid and logical method of understanding the question would seem to be not to proceed upon some theoretical arrangement of the argument, but to take up, in successive order, each word as it occurs in the disputed clauses of the Constitution and discuss the subject by a consideration of the history of their interpretation.

Clause 1 of section 3 provides that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State." In thus constituting the Senate of the United States it is expressly declared that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State; it is not declared that it may be composed of two Senators from each State; and it is not left discretionary either with the Senate or with any other body that a vacancy shall exist in either one of the two offices of Senator from each State. The proper officials of the various States, impelled by their public duty under their oath of office, are expected to send to this body the full representation from the State. It is the duty of the Senate itself to carry out this evident purpose of the Constitution by aiding and assisting in every way possible. The paramount purpose, in fact, of the Constitution in creating the Senate of the United States, in providing a method of electing its membership and filling vacancies therein is clearly that the Senate shall be preserved in its integrity as a body composed of two Senators representing each State in the Union.

There is every reason to suppose, when we consider the important character of the Senate in the structure of our Government, that the intention of the framers of the Constitution must necessarily have been to make the broadest and most complete provision for the maintenance of its integrity, and that integrity, it is clear, is involved in keeping the Senate full. It is admitted by all that it is desirable that the Senate shall be kept always filled, and the only point of dissension is whether we are to make every reasonable effort to carry out this admitted paramount purpose of the Constitution, or whether we shall, for whatever technical or minor reasons may exist in the mind of anyone, permit that great purpose to be frustrated.

That this purpose to keep the Senate full must have been strong in the minds of the framers of the Constitution is evident when we consider the importance which they attached to the constitution of the Senate. Many conflicting theories prevailed as to the manner in which this branch of the National Legislature should be constituted. Many suggestions were made and considered. The Senate was to be chosen by the first branch of the legislature; it was to be chosen by the State legislature; it was to be chosen by the people; it was to be appointed by the President; it was to be chosen from districts throughout the Union or to be apportioned by the representatives after a census; the power of nomination was to be given to the State legislature; the States were to be represented according to their importance or in proportion to their property; or on a basis of equal representation of the States in the body. It was originally supposed that the Senate would be of aristocratic character; that it would be a restraint on the excesses of democracy, and consist of persons of wealth and influence, with power and ability to resist the encroachments of the Executive. It was supposed that its duration would be for life; that there should be a property qualification; and that many executive functions should be given it, such as the appointment of ambassadors and judges.

When the work had been completed it was found that there were certain purposes in the constitution of the Senate, which have been set forth by Alexander Hamilton in five letters in "The Federalist." They were to conciliate the spirit of independence in the several States by giving each, however small, equal representation with every other, however large, in one branch of the National Government; to create a council qualified by its moderate size and the experience of its members to advise and check the President in the exercise of his power of appointing to office and concluding treaties; to furnish a restraint and check upon the tyranny and mutability in opinion of popular majorities represented more closely in the House of Representatives; to provide a body of men less subject to frequent changes in membership and comparatively free from popular clamor, so that they might constitute an element of stability in the government of the nation, enabling it to maintain its character in the eyes of foreign states and to preserve a continuity of policy at home and abroad; and, finally, to establish a court proper for the trial of impeachment, a remedy necessary to prevent the abuse of power by the Executive. A Senator is the representative of the sovereignty of the State; he represents the State in its political capacity. Its members in earlier times regarded themselves as a sort of congress of ambassadors from their respective States, and they were accustomed to refer for advice and instructions each to his State legislature.

As a compromise between the advocates of proportional representation and the advocates of States' rights and States' sovereignty, the plan was finally determined on of giving each Senator one vote and each State an equal representation. So strong was the final determination that the Senate should consist of an equal representation of the States that it was provided in Article V that—

No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Is it not clear, when we consider, therefore, the history of the evolution of the Senate from out of the many diverse and contending theories into the form in which it was finally created, that the framers of the Constitution intended to create what is the most important branch of the whole system of our government—a permanent body existing as an intermediate link between the Executive and the House of Representatives and preeminently an assurance of the continuance and stability of our institutions?

It is hardly necessary to go into details as to the overwhelming importance of carrying out this paramount purpose of the framers of the Constitution in having the Senate kept filled. No technicalities or subtleties should stand in the way of consummating this essentially important end. Any doubts, if such exist, should be resolved in favor of this object, the importance of which is admitted by everyone. The work of a Senator, especially from some of the larger States, is sufficiently arduous and burdensome to render it extremely desirable, in order that the public business of the State may be properly expedited, that the State should be represented by two Senators. The inconvenience to the members of this body incurred by such vacancies is considerable, because the mechanism of the Senate in committee assignments and in other matters pertaining to the conduct of its business is more or less disturbed. The equal representation solemnly guaranteed by the Constitution to each State is imperiled. Even upon broader and wider grounds it can be said that the people of every other State, of all the United States, are interested in having, and are entitled to have, every State in this Union fully represented upon the floor of this body.

It has been argued that we can easily afford to have year after year one or more States but partially represented here, and that no serious or practical inconvenience results. It has been maintained that in some way it is the fault of the State because the State legislature fails to elect, and that the State should suffer therefor, as if no other part of the country had any interest in maintaining the full integrity of the Senate. It might frequently happen that where a majority of the people of the United States had declared one way upon a question and were entitled to be represented by a certain majority of Senators to this body upon that question that the popular will might be frustrated and nullified by the failure of one, two, or three legislatures to elect.

There have been several important cases bearing out this statement. There have been great questions settled in this Senate by a majority of one or two votes. Had the States represented by the Senators in those small majorities been unrepresented or but partially represented, these great questions would have been determined otherwise. The tariff of 1846 was defeated by the casting vote of George M. Dallas, then Vice-President. The impeachment of Andrew Johnson was defeated by 1 vote. The force bill was defeated in the Senate by 1 vote. This very question of the validity of an executive appointment was determined in this Senate in the Mantle case by a vote so close that but for a misunderstanding regarding certain pairs it might have been determined otherwise and exist to-day as a precedent in favor of the present appointment. Other equally notable instances might be cited.

While a Senator is primarily a representative of an organized political constituency, representing the government of a sovereign State and possessed with high executive functions, he at the same time is a member of a legislative body, and, as such, under broad interpretation of the duties and functions of a member of such a body, represents after his entrance into this Senate not alone the State which has sent him here, but the people of the United States; and he has imposed upon him the duty to represent them conscientiously and faithfully; while the people, also, have a right to look to him as well as to their own representatives and have an equal interest in having the Senatorial position filled. When we contemplate the rapidity of our growth and the vast population which will in the lifetime of many of us occupy our domain, the far-seeing statesman can not fail to realize the importance of exercising every precaution calculated to maintain unimpaired all of the coordinate branches of this Government as established by the Constitution.

It is somewhat remarkable, as I have already stated, upon a study of this question to develop the fact that the progress of interpretation of this provision of the Constitution regarding the Senate of the United States has been continually in the direction of carrying out this paramount purpose to which I have referred, and which must be obvious to all. Step by step this progress has been met by the narrow, technical, and reactionary spirit which has exhibited itself in other branches of constitutional development. Every word in the two clauses above quoted has been interpreted and even strained to carry out this purpose against opposition of this character. One of the last points left for this reactionary sentiment to contend over is this question of the validity of Executive appointments. As we proceed to interpret the meaning of the constitutional provisions relative to the Senate, let us also consider how these words have been interpreted with the paramount object in view of facilitating the election of Senators and promoting the purpose of maintaining the integrity of the Senate. Two striking instances are found in the very next words of this clause.

The very next words in clause 1 of section 3, coming after those already quoted and explained, namely, the words "chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years," have been interpreted not as their strict and literal meaning would indicate, but with a liberal, reasonable, and fair desire to carry out the purpose of the Constitution.

If the narrow construction which is applied by Senators on the other side of this question should be applied here and the literal rendering of these words should be taken, the legislature of a State would have no authority to elect for a term of less than six years. Consequently, where the legislature failed to elect a Senator prior to the expiration of a term, the term having commenced, they could not fill such vacancy by election, because the election would not be for six years, but for a less period than six years; and doubtless it would be argued that the legislature having failed in its duty to provide in advance for filling the office of Senator in ample time before the beginning of the term, the State should incur the penalty for such delinquency by being unrepresented until a new term came round. But those who delight in technicalities and quibbles have hardly gone this far in applying this rendering to these words. While literally only authorized to choose Senators for a term of six years, legislatures continually choose Senators for lesser periods of two, three, or four years, or whatever may be the balance of the Senatorial term for which they may elect, and this departure from a literal rendering of the Constitution has been a proper interpretation of the purpose of the Constitution that the Senate of the United States should be kept filled.

The second instance found in the words referred to in clause 1, in which the literal meaning of the Constitution has been still further strained in order that the election of Senators might be facilitated, is strikingly shown in the manner of choosing Senators. The Constitution declares that they shall be chosen by the legislatures of the States. It would seem clear from this language that the requirement of the Constitution in regard to the election of Senators would not be complied with unless its members were elected by the legislatures of the several States in the same way that laws are passed by the concurrent act of the two branches, approved by the executive, or at least by elections held separately in each independent legislative chamber. But the practice long prevailed, and was silently acquiesced in by the Senate, of electing its members by joint ballot of the two branches of a State legislature, in which the members constitute one aggregate body, and in which the less numerous branch is dissipated and lost in the larger. This practice has now been established by the act of Congress of 1866, and while its constitutionality has been questioned, for all practical purposes it is now too late to call into question this mode of election.

So far as most of the States are concerned this legislation by Congress has been affirmed by State legislation; nevertheless, as it is not competent for the members of a legislative assembly to do any ordinary act of legislation by proceeding in joint ballot, an election effected by the members of the legislature in that manner can not properly be said to be the choice by the legislature. Perhaps there could be no greater evidence from the point of view of the Senators upon the other side of this question of a strained and almost violating interpretation of the Constitution, made and acquiesced in to facilitate the election of Senators that the Senate may be kept filled, than is afforded by this instance. Chancellor Kent says in his commentaries that if the question was a new one it might well be maintained—that when the Constitution directed that the Senators should be chosen by the legislature it meant not the members of the legislature per capita, but the legislature in the true technical sense, being the two houses acting in their separate and organized capacities, with the ordinary constitutional right of negative on each other's proceedings. (Kent's Commentaries vol. 1, 225.)

The final words of clause 1 of section 3 are:

and each Senator shall have one vote.

The fact that the States of this Union are here upon an equal basis is one of the striking features of the constitution of the Senate. It is an element for conservatism in the construction of our Government, however much it might have been the result of a necessary compromise. Every patriotic American, to whatever State he may belong, should have an interest and a pride in the success and welfare of each of the splendid sovereign Commonwealths that constitute our Union. No jealousy or cavil at this equality of representation should be felt. Those small States of the original thirteen which formed this Government are entitled to be here because they equally with the other original States helped to achieve our independence and are entitled to maintain their partnership in this Union, even if it can not be expected that they will ever on account of physical conditions, again cope in actual equality with the larger Commonwealths. Those newer States, splendid in their size and in their fertility and possessing brilliant possibilities, while smaller in population at present than some of the older Commonwealths, give promise of becoming at no distant day the seat of empire. At the same time the fact can not be forgotten that a State like Pennsylvania, with some seven million people and with thirty Representatives at the other end of the Capitol, is here in this Senate placed on an inequality with other States which may have but one, two, or three Representatives in the House.

That such a penalty should be inflicted upon our people for no fault of theirs is unjust and unsufferable. To attempt to assert that a State must suffer in this way by partial representation simply because a State legislature, through causes absolutely beyond the control of the people of the State, and even beyond the control of the legislature itself, failed to elect a Senator, and that the State must therefore go but partly represented, is a proposition that will not be long tolerated by practical men, however much such refinements may delight the student and the lawyer; and the inconvenience and the injustice become all the more intolerable when it is felt that the Constitution has provided ample means to insure to the State full representation. Great communities and great interests will not long permit their rights to be frittered away and imperiled by arguments of this character.

I have carefully gone over seriatim the words of clause 1 of section 3 of article 1, and it will be difficult to detect a purpose so far of any opening for objection to the validity of executive appointments. On the contrary, it is evident, in view of the paramount purpose of the Constitution and the express words of the provision itself, that every effort should be made to promote the preservation of a full Senate, and in two cases to which I have referred, the words have actually been strained, and properly so, to secure the purpose.

I shall now proceed to consider briefly that part of clause 2 of section 3 which reads as follows:

> Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year.

We herein reach the first word involved in the dispute. The words "vacated" and "vacancy" are the subjects of the argument. Certainly, there can not be any doubt about the meaning of the word "vacated" in this conjunction. It is distinctly stated by the words of the Constitution that the seats of Senators are vacated at the expiration of the term for which they are elected. In the beginning these terms were determined by lot. After they have been once established, they are vacated at the expiration of the terms, which will occur upon days fixed and certain.

There can be no difference of opinion as to the meaning of the Constitution in the use of the word "vacated." The Senatorial term is "vacated" at the expiration of the term. The seat being "vacated," the logical consequence is that there is a vacancy. A vacancy should originally be filled by the legislature by the election of a Senator for a full term of six years, as we have seen; but where that does not occur or can not occur for any reason, the office remains "vacated." A vacancy exists, and the purpose of the Constitution is that it shall be filled, by election by the legislature, for the full term, or by temporary executive appointment until the legislature meets. It was an old contention, and, in fact, it was the first limitation attempted to be set up against the right of the governor to appoint, that the governor could not appoint to fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a Senatorial term. "Happen" was construed to mean a vacancy happening in a term after that term had once been filled. This view undoubtedly prevailed at one time, but, as a matter of fact, the Senate has allowed many appointments by governors at the beginning of Senatorial terms.

Beginning with the case of Cocke, of Tennessee, in 1797, and coming down to the case of Pasco, of Florida, in March, 1893, there have been thirteen cases in which the governor has appointed a Senator to take his seat at the beginning of a Senatorial term, and in each case the Senator has been admitted to his seat. By these precedents, therefore, the Senate has utterly destroyed the old notion that a vacancy can not possibly happen in a term unless that very term has once been filled. The ingenious reasoning by which a term vacated by its expiration was declared to be not vacant because it had never once been filled, illustrated by many arguments, is now of little interest except as marking the futility of such abstruse speculations, and as indicating another stage in the progress of a liberal construction of the Constitution in order that the Senate may be kept filled.

The remaining paragraph of the clause already quoted reads as follows:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Almost every word in this simple paragraph has been the subject of argument and of refinement and speculation. The contention begins over the word "vacancy." It was obvious to the framers of the Constitution that vacancies might occur which would defeat the intention of always having two Senators from each State, and, therefore, we find this provision. Legislatures might not be in session, and vacancies might naturally be expected to occur at such periods. It might be inconvenient and needlessly expensive to call a session of the legislature for a special session prior to the time of its regular meeting, and, therefore, it was provided that the executive might make temporary appointments, and it is under this part of the clause last quoted that the governor of a State derives his power to fill vacancies, regardless of any State constitution or law.

To the ordinary man it is clear that "vacancy" is the state of being empty or unfilled. The natural and common-sense meaning of the word "vacancy" as applied to an office is that any office without an incumbent is vacant, within a proper legal or constitutional construction. Such an office is certainly not filled, and no incumbent exercises the functions of the office. If it is not filled, in what condition does it exist, if it is not vacant? Black and Bouvier define the word "vacancy" to be "a place which is empty." Webster defines it as "the state of being destitute of an incumbent." In fact, it may be very seriously questioned whether any authority can be cited upon which a lawyer would be willing to rely that takes a different view of the question. In the light of every authority the word "vacancy" applies to every office without an incumbent which the governor has the power to fill, no matter how the vacancy is created, so that the conclusion necessarily forces itself upon us that the governor has the right to fill any vacancy that may happen from any cause which exists after the legislature has adjourned.

John Quincy Adams stated that he believed in relation to offices that every one happens to be vacant which is not full, and that, he believed, was the meaning and sense of the Constitution whether the vacancy occurred from casualty, the regular course of events, the expiration of term, or other cause. I take it that there can be no dispute among sensible men as to the meaning of the word "vacancy," if we take it standing alone. It refers to an office, as I have said, without an incumbent; and taken in connection with the similar word already referred to and used a few lines above, the word "vacated," it is clear that upon the expiration of a Senatorial term the office is vacated and the vacancy exists.

So far, therefore, in our progress in reading the words of the Constitution, there would seem no ground for dispute. But we approach the next word, and there the opportunity is apparently given for the flood of argument and disquisition which has obscured this subject. The vacancy must "happen." Those who deny the power of the governor to fill the present vacancy give the word "happen" a restricted, technical meaning, and say that it refers only to the point of time at which the vacancy began. This point of time, it is alleged, is momentary and connected only with the beginning of the event. It is stated that the word happened means originated, and it is argued that in this sense alone the word "happen" was used. An attempt is made sharply to define the word "happen" and to deny that it covers any part of the duration of the event happening. This construction, however, of the word "happen" is forced and technical. It disregards some of the most ordinary uses of the word "happen," which include duration of the event.

I hesitate to go into the battle of dictionaries which has been witnessed time and time again upon the floor of this Senate. There is not a dictionary of received authority that does not define "happen" as being "to take place; to come to pass; to be met with; to fall out; to meet with." Examples need not be multiplied to show that at least one of the common-sense meanings of the word "happen" includes not only the first moment the event happens or begins, but also the duration or continuance of the same. The word "happen" is frequently used with other words to express a continuing condition. A certain condition happens to prevail, or happens to exist, or happens to be, or happens to take place, but the additional words are not necessary, so frequently are they associated with the word "happen," and one of the most common uses of the word is to express this continuing condition. If, then, the word "happen" means not only the moment of first occurrence but also the duration of the event, which definition should be given to it in defining this clause? The answer must be, whatever gives it the broadest and most liberal meaning. The reasons greatly preponderate in favor of the broader, more conclusive meaning, than of the strictly technical one.

Without, however, proceeding further for the present with the consideration of this word "happen," to which I shall subsequently recur, let us proceed to the next four words, "by resignation, or otherwise." And here again we strike the contention that not only must the vacancy be fortuitous, as the result of unforeseen casualty, or accident, but that it is actually restricted by the words of the Constitution to vacancies occurring by resignation or some similar cause. These words are held to be words of restriction. It is said that the word "otherwise" does not mean "otherwise," but "likewise," and that the vacancy must be of a similar character to that of the resignation. Difficult as it may be to detect any similarity, vacancies caused by death are arbitrarily placed in the class of those similar to vacancies caused by resignation or vacancies caused by expulsion, notwithstanding the fact that the one is voluntary and the other two are involuntary. Expulsion for cause is a vacancy similar to resignation according to this arbitrary classification, although some grave doubt has been raised as to whether a person incapacitated from insanity would properly come within this classification.

Vacancies caused by defects in State constitutions or by the determination of a Senatorial term by lot are welcomed as approaching in character those due to death, expulsion, or insanity; but the arbitrary line is drawn on one of the most unexpected and uncontrollable contingencies which usually happens in modern times, the inability of the legislature of a State to elect a Senator. It must be borne in mind that the plain language of the Constitution does not classify vacancies for the purpose of making temporary appointments or permanent elections. The Constitution does not specify that certain kinds of vacancies are to be filled by temporary appointments and certain other kinds by permanent elections. These classifications are arbitrary ones, made by those who seem determined to make every effort to find some loophole through which States can be deprived of their representation in this body on some occasions.

Those who take a technical view of the Constitution hold that the words "resignation, or otherwise" are words of limitation, and that the word "otherwise" is intended to indicate a vacancy which happens in some such manner, as by resignation. Those who take a broader and more liberal view of the Constitution contend that the word "otherwise" is intended to cover every other kind of vacancy that may happen and exist than by resignation. It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of constitutions that the instrument must be construed to give effect to the intention of the people who adopted it.

"Never forget," said Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch vs. Maryland, "that it is a constitution we are construing." It has been frequently decided that the words in a constitution are to be taken in their natural and popular sense, unless they are technical legal terms, in which case they are to be taken in their legal signification. The words "resignation, or otherwise" are not technical legal terms, and therefore do not come within the purview of the exception to the general rule. The general rule of construction certainly must apply to the words "resignation, or otherwise." The popular as well as the philological meaning of the word "otherwise" is "other ways," and, if this rule is to be applied, it would seem as though there could be no doubt what the word "otherwise" means as used in the Constitution.

Senator Edmunds, in a very able presentation of the Bell case, among many other striking points made, stated the rule as follows:

> The Constitution is speaking of vacant offices, and not of the incumbent at all except in the first place. There is where the Senator from Georgia and I appear to differ. The Constitution is looking to have each State represented in this body all the time, and by some method the Constitution provides and looks to do it; and, therefore, when it uses the word "otherwise" it uses a comprehensive term, so that in whatever way a State ceases to have opportunity to express its full voice here in this council of States, it shall be filled up temporarily by the governor until the legislature, the chief and sovereign power in the State, at its next meeting, can have an opportunity to fill it.

It is admitted that in the consideration of constitutional questions too much weight can not be attached to citations from the debates in conventions. They are of value as showing the views of individual members and as indicating the reasons for their votes. They do not, however, give us any light as to the views of the large majority who did not speak. It is a recognized principle, therefore, that in the end the Constitution must be construed from what appears upon its face. At the same time the evidence which we find in the Debates of the Federal Convention regarding the question as to whether or not the words "resignation, or otherwise" are words of limitation is so clear and to the point and so absolutely corroborative of the plain and evident reading of the objects of the Constitution that it is essential to refer to it. As a matter of fact, the original draft of the Constitution did not contain the words "by resignation, or otherwise." The report of the Committee of Detail, as set forth in the Debates in the Federal Convention, section 1, article 5, reads as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the legislatures of the several States. Each legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature. Each member shall have one vote.

Several interesting points are found in the Debates upon this section and every one bears out the argument contended for as to the validity of gubernatorial appointments. Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. He thought it removed the appointment too far from the people, the executives in most of the States being then elected by the legislatures. As he had always thought the appointment of the executive by the legislative department wrong, so it was still more so that the executive should elect into the legislative department. Thereupon Mr. Randolph declared that he thought the provision necessary.

> In order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate—

He went on to say—

> in some States the legislatures meet but once a year. As the Senate will have more power and consist of a smaller number than the other House, vacancies there will be of more significance. The executives might safely be trusted with the appointment for so short a time.

Mr. Ellsworth was evidently impressed with the same idea, that some means must be provided so that the Senate should always be full. He called attention to the fact that the executive "may supply vacancies." When the legislative meeting happened to be near, the power would not be exercised. "As there will be but two members from a State," he said, "vacancies may be of great moment." On the question of striking out "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive" the amendment was defeated by a vote of 8 to 1. There could be no more striking illustration than is found in this portion of the debates as to the paramount idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution that the Senate should always be kept full by their making complete provision for temporarily filling vacancies when the legislature was not in session. The question then arose in the debates, raised by Mr. Madison, whether resignations could be made by Senators, and he moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words:

> happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the legislature in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the legislature.

Mr. Madison, perhaps, had in mind the case of a member of the English Parliament who could not resign, and in order to give up his office he was obliged to accept the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, a nominal position, which, however, afforded the legal pretext. May says in his Parliamentary Practice (pages 637, 638):

> It is a settled principle of parliamentary law that a member, after he is duly chosen, can not relinquish his seat; and in order to evade this restriction a member who wishes to retire accepts office under the Crown, which legally vacates his seat and obliges the house to issue a new writ. The offices usually selected for this purpose are those of steward or bailiff or Her Majesty's three Chiltern Hundreds of Stoke, Desborough, and Bonenham, or of the manors of East Hundred Northstead or Hempholme, or of escheator of Munster, which, although they have sometimes been refused, are ordinarily given by the treasury to any member who applies for them, unless there appears to be sufficient ground for withholding them, and are resigned again as soon as their purpose is effected.

But, however this may be, there was a real and important reason for this provision, stated clearly by Gouverneur Morris, who declared the amendment absolutely necessary, otherwise members chosen to the Senate would be disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of the article then under consideration. It would be in the power of the legislature by appointing a man as Senator against his consent to deprive the United States of his services. Mr. Madison's motion was agreed to. As the Constitution was finally worded, "refusal to accept" was stricken out and the simple words "by resignation, or otherwise" retained as reported from the committee on style and arrangement. This committee on style and arrangement did not have any authority to add new matter or to change the substance of the provisions of the Constitution, their office and their only office being to perfect the style and arrangement of the instrument. Having rewritten what had been agreed to by the Convention, the committee must necessarily have adopted the final phraseology as the best to express what the Convention had agreed to upon the motion of Mr. Madison. To express it in other words, the committee on style and arrangement must have intended that the words "by resignation, or otherwise" should cover all the subjects as expressed in the motion of Mr. Madison.

It certainly, therefore, seems beyond any cavil or dispute that the framers of the Constitution were impressed with the necessity of keeping the Senate full, and with the grave inconveniences arising from having chasms in the representation. For this reason, and for the better protection of the smaller States, they deliberately put into the original draft of the Constitution the provision authorizing the governor to appoint in case of vacancies, although against the protest made at the time by Mr. Ellsworth, who was opposed to giving this power to the executives. Subsequently the doubt was raised as to whether Senators could resign. This was considered a very serious question, because it was provided in the original draft of the Constitution that Senators should be disqualified for holding office for a certain period, and it was thought that the legislature, by electing a person against his will as a Senator, might thereby disqualify him from holding important offices. These reasons, and these reasons alone, were the cause of putting in the words "by refusal to accept, by resignation, or otherwise." The words "Refusal to accept" were stricken out for the sake of brevity and conciseness, evidently, and the words "by resignation, or otherwise," were retained. It is evident that "resignation" was put in, not as a limitation upon the character of the vacancy, but to recognize a right to resign, regarding which a question had been raised, and then the word "otherwise" was deliberately added to include all vacancies, indicating as plainly as English language can indicate anything that no limitation was intended, but that resignation being recognized as a right, every other form of vacancy was subsequently included by the succeeding word.

The next words in clause 2 of section 3 of the Constitution, already referred to, namely, "during the recess of the legislature of any State," have likewise given rise to dispute. Even here we are struck with the fact that it has been necessary to apply the most liberal construction to these words in the Constitution in order to keep the Senate full, because if we held to the literal, technical rendering there would be many vacancies in this body continually. The word "recess" is applied to the interval of time in which the event must happen. Webster defines recess as an "intermission, as of a legislative body, court, or school." It means a temporary suspension, as distinct from an adjournment sine die, and contemplates a foreseen reassembling. Now, a legislature generally adjourns sine die without the intention of reassembling, the period for which most legislatures, under modern constitutions, are permitted to sit being limited in time. When the legislature adjourns, there can be no intention of reassembling. The legislature is unable to reassemble of its own volition, and the only possibility of its being recalled during the latter period of its legislative life is upon the call of the executive. The adjournment sine die, therefore, is not technically a recess in its narrow sense.

If we are compelled to take the narrow meaning of the word "recess," and if the word "happen" must be restricted to the point of time at which the event began or originated, as is claimed by those who dispute the validity of these executive appointments, then you have the inevitable result that the governor can only appoint when a vacancy happens in a recess of a few hours or days of a session; he can not appoint at all when it happens after an adjournment sine die. No one contends for a moment for this technical construction of the word "recess." Yet such a contention would be no more narrow, no more technical, no more strained, than that which is striven for to restrict the word "happen."

Can the Senators on the other side of this question explain how they can decently, without wrenching their consciences, depart from the primary meaning of the word "recess" and adopt its secondary meaning? Can custom, or use, or practical necessity be the reason that their feelings are so blunted to this irregularity? In fact, the interpretation which has necessarily been put upon the word "recess" is hardly even consonant with the use or modern meaning of the word, which is after all really in accordance with the definition already cited from the dictionary; but that interpretation has been placed upon it and acquiesced in since the foundation of the Government, that the great, paramount purpose of the Constitution might be carried out of keeping the Senate full; and yet we are met with refinement after refinement, technicality after technicality, spread around the word "happen." The opponents of the governor's right, in other words, would set up the arbitrary distinction that the vacancy must actually begin during the recess of the legislature, the word "happen," according to their contention, being necessarily confined to what they call its primary meaning, as involving a fortuitous event, and "resignation, or otherwise" being considered words of restriction. The arbitrary distinction is then set up that the vacancy must actually begin during the recess of the legislature. This interpretation clearly perverts the intention of the Constitution.

As already explained, the vacancy happens; it exists; it is an actual condition. The recognition is distinctly made that Senators can resign, and that in that case, and in the case of all other vacancies, appointments may be made. The actual condition of the vacancy continues during the recess of the legislature, whether it began while the legislature was in session, before the legislature ever met, the day of its final adjournment, or after such final adjournment. What object could the framers of the Constitution have had to restrict the governor to filling vacancies only when the vacancy originated or began in a recess and not to include a vacancy which began before but continued into the recess, and while every word and act of theirs in debate and in every word of the Constitution would indicate their paramount purpose of providing for the filling of vacancies in the Senate in order that it might be kept full? They could easily have used the phrase "if vacancies should begin or originate in recess," and their meaning would have been clearly defined.

The succeeding words of this much disputed clause are:

> The executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It will be observed, in the first place, that the executive "may" make these appointments. It is not mandatory upon the executive. He will be supposed to use his reasonable discretion in the exercise of his power. It was presumed by the framers of the Constitution that if the legislature should happen to meet very soon after the occurrence of such a vacancy the power might not be exercised. In the interpretation placed upon the words "until the next meeting of the legislature" we have another striking illustration of the liberal construction which has been put upon this part of the Constitution in order to keep the Senate full. Technically speaking, the words "until the meeting of the legislature," taken in their narrowest sense, would mean until the day the legislature meets, and then the question might well be raised as to whether this restriction of time applied to the period during which the temporary appointment would go or defined the period during which the governor might exercise the power of appointment.

It can be assumed that as far as the word "until" applies either to the governor's power or to the temporary term, it can be construed to apply to both. The temporary appointment lasts until the meeting of the legislature, and the governor, of course, can only exercise the power of appointment until the meeting of the legislature. But the striking point is that the word "until" has been interpreted in its most liberal sense not to be confined to the day of the meeting of the legislature, but to continue through the session of the legislature until the day of its adjournment sine die, or until an election for Senator is accomplished. There can be only one object for this interpretation of the word "until," and that object is apparent that there should not be an inconvenient chasm in the Senate between the first day of the meeting and organization of the legislature and the period of greater or less extent which must necessarily elapse before a Senator can be elected. In the case of Samuel S. Phelps, the minority report of the committee, which was finally adopted, declares:

> Perhaps it would have been as well if the strict and literal meaning of the words "until the next meeting of the legislature" had been observed on the first occasion in which their construction was brought into question; that would have had the merit of certainty, but a certainty that might have been too severe for the true and liberal intendment of the framers of the Constitution. They certainly did mean to say that the executive appointment should terminate when legislative jurisdiction shall commence or be exercised. To give this severe construction to the words quoted would in all cases leave a State unrepresented for a time, and dependent on legislative action. Rather than hold to that result the Senate, under the precedents quoted, seemed to have regarded the "next meeting of the legislature" as synonymous with the next session of the legislature, during which time the member under executive appointment might hold his seat, unless it should be filled by an election before the termination of a session; and this was probably an analogy to that provision of the Federal Constitution by which power is vested in the President to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

It was thought at the time that the Senate went very far when it gave an interpretation to the words referred to beyond their literal meaning limiting the term to the day of the meeting of the legislature. This construction met with a decided opposition from a respectable minority. The construction put upon these words is a striking illustration of the thought paramount in the minds of all, that the great purpose of the Constitution must always be kept in view, that the Senate should be kept full—always full.

What vacancies can the legislature fill at its next meeting? The Constitution says all vacancies that the executive did fill or could have filled by temporary appointment. This is clearly indicated through the whole context of the provision in reference to the filling of vacancies and especially by the use of the adjective "such." What vacancies are meant by the words "such vacancies"? The vacancies mentioned in the first part of the clause; that is, vacancies that happen "by resignation, or otherwise" and which the executive has the right to fill by executive appointment. The word "such" is defined by the Century Dictionary to mean—

> 1. Of that kind; of the like kind or degree; like; similar.
> 2. The same as previously mentioned or specified; not other or different.

So that when the word "such" is used before the word "vacancies" in the latter part of the clause, it means the same kind of vacancies mentioned in the first part of the clause in reference to executive appointments. It therefore appears that there can be no vacancy filled by the legislature that could not, in the first instance, have been filled by executive appointment. It is admitted that the legislature can fill all vacancies, no matter how created, and it therefore follows that the governor can fill, by temporary appointment, the same kind of vacancies. The vacancies to be filled by executive appointment are as broad as the vacancies which can be filled by election.

In other words, the Constitution of the United States clearly intended to create a Senate, and to have a Senate implies that the membership of that Senate shall be represented in full, in every principle of justice to the people and protection to the smaller States. To provide for the creation of that Senate it was distinctly declared that the Senators should be chosen by the legislatures, and in order to meet every possible emergency it was also provided that in case of vacancies the governor should appoint. Each authority is equal in its respective sphere; one is neither inferior nor superior to the other. The object of the Constitution was that the States should be represented, and for that purpose, and in order to avoid every possible contingency of partial representation, or, perhaps, an absence of representation the Constitution created two methods of constituting Senators, namely, by election for a full term or the remainder of a term and by temporary appointment. The former was vested in the legislature of the State and the latter in the governor. The powers of each are separately and distinctly given; they are independent powers. The governor has nothing to do with elections; the legislature has nothing to do with temporary appointments. The legislature is to elect and the governor is to fill temporarily vacancies, however occurring, and by these two means the self-evident purpose of the Constitution in creating the Senate is to be accomplished—that the Senate should be kept filled. Any other interpretation is not to carry out, but to defeat the constitutional intent.

To argue that the Constitution, which created a Senate and exercised every precaution that the States should be fully represented, meant to deprive a State of a Senator and take from the governor his power of temporary appointment, merely because the legislature failed to elect, is to maintain that the framers of the Constitution intended to punish not only the State which might be involved, but all the people of the United States, by reason of such restriction. There might be some ground for apprehension if the governor appointed for the balance of the term, but his appointment is only at the most for a few months, a temporary appointment expressly provided for in order to prevent an inconvenient chasm in the Senate, the integrity of whose organization has been promoted and facilitated by the liberal interpretation which has been placed upon almost every other word in the Constitution bearing upon the United States Senate. A temporary appointment by the governor, therefore, creates a Senatorial commission of force and validity and authority fully equal to an election by the legislature. In fact, as already observed in reference to the method of balloting for Senators, the governor is a constituent part of the legislature of a State. It is true that he is not included in State constitutions under the article on the legislature, but under a separate article on the executive; but that is because his executive functions form a distinct branch of our system of government and require a separate article. The fact remains, however, that his approval is needed to every act of the two houses of the legislature.

The tendency of modern constitutional regulations, indeed, has been to increase still further his position and influence in the extension of the veto power, so that its exercise has assumed almost the character of actual legislation. A striking illustration of this extension is the power given to the governor in many States to veto an item in an appropriation bill, instead of being restricted, as heretofore, to the approval or disapproval of the whole measure, thus giving the governor more power over the disbursements of the State than either or both of the two houses of the legislature. So important is the governor in the coordinate branches of the legislature that he has generally come to be looked upon by the people as a protection against the legislature, which frequently is corrupt and controlled by corporate or political influences. Where there are many men responsibility is divided and no one man can have concentrated upon him the responsibility for bad or unpopular public acts. Therefore, there is no such responsibility about a legislature as there is about an executive. Upon the executive is concentrated the criticism of the whole community for all public acts, and this is found to be a wholesome restraint in the interests of good government, however evilly disposed an executive might be.

So far has this development of modern American law progressed that the tendency has been to restrict legislatures by limiting their sessions to once in two or four years, and by taking from them a very large part of those general powers which attach to the legislative body as representing a sovereign State. Special legislation has been abolished. As many matters as may possibly be performed through general laws and the instrumentality of courts have been relegated thereto; while the executive, on the other hand, has had his power increased and extended. Particularly is this true in our municipalities, where the concentration of all patronage and power in the hands of a single executive and the fastening upon him individually of the full responsibility for the administration of municipal affairs is a modern tendency of municipal legislation. The governor of a State appoints judges, and many other State officers. It is argued that he may appoint a favorite to the senatorship. He is no more likely to appoint a favorite to the senatorship than to make any other important appointment for the same reason. As a rule, the governor will represent a majority of the people, and in most cases a majority of the legislature. It is said that a clique may hold up the legislature in order to throw the appointment into the hands of the governor, but, as a matter of fact, the power of a clique, under the act of Congress of 1866 providing for the election of Senators by requiring for such election a majority of all the members of the legislature, is directly promoted by the provisions of this act.

In this connection I will state that in my opinion a large part of the difficulties encountered by legislatures in coming to an agreement upon the question of electing a United States Senator arises from that provision in the act of 1866 which requires a majority of the whole legislature to elect a Senator. In almost every other branch of our political system a plurality is sufficient to elect. A plurality of the citizens elects the members of the legislature themselves, the governor of the State, and all other officers. It would seem as if a plurality would be sufficient to elect a Senator by a legislature. The act of 1866 was a compromise upon the original intendment of the Constitution. It would seem as if a Senator must be chosen as a legislative act, and it was consequently provided that the first effort to elect should be made by the two houses separately. Then the scheme of a joint ballot was adopted as the only practical way to accomplish an election after each house had failed to cast a majority for the same person in their separate capacities. It was necessary to strain the meaning of the Constitution in order to form a practical method of electing Senators. The difficulty involved in the requirement of a majority to elect is that it places the control of the legislature in the hands of one, two, three, or more persons, who, by holding out, are frequently enabled to dictate their own terms or to prevent the election of a Senator.

I believe that there is a bill now pending before Congress, introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, which, among other provisions, does away with the requirement of a majority. While it is to be admitted that certain abuses can arise under the requirement of a mere plurality, such as the possibility that the minority in a legislature might elect a Senator where the majority might be divided into two factions, which were unable to agree, yet, upon the whole, it would seem as if some method which would permit an election of some kind would tend in the end to the coherence of whatever party might be in the majority in the legislature, and in any event would permit the election of a Senator, which is now frequently really impossible where three or more separate parties or factions exist in a legislature, each widely, and at the same time often sincerely, disagreeing with each other and utterly unable to come together.

There are two other cases in the Constitution in which vacancies are referred to, and the interpretation which has been placed upon the word in these two instances is full of instruction for the construction of the word "vacancies" in connection with the filling of vacancies in the United States Senate. Clause 3 of section 2 of article 2 of the Federal Constitution provides:

> The President shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

At a very early date the question was raised whether or not, under this provision of the Constitution, the President had the right to fill up a vacancy that had occurred by expiration of the full term or in any other manner while the Senate was in session, which vacancy, not having been filled, continued to exist during the recess of the Senate. The construction placed upon this provision by numerous Attorneys-General of the United States and by the courts very largely aids in arriving at a proper construction of this constitutional provision authorizing the governor to make temporary appointments. On the expiration of General Swartwout's commission as Navy agent at New York, while the Senate was in session, the President nominated another person to fill the vacancy and sent the name to the Senate for confirmation, which was not made before the Senate adjourned. The vacancy continued to exist during the recess, and the President asked the Attorney-General whether he had the right to fill the vacancy by temporary appointment until the end of the next session of the Senate. Attorney-General Wirt, in a well-considered opinion, held that it was a vacancy within the meaning of the Constitution, and that it could be temporarily filled by an appointment by the President. In this connection he discusses the use of the word "happen" and says, among other things:

> The doubt arises from the circumstances of its having first occurred during the session of the Senate. But the expression used by the Constitution is "happen"—"all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." The most natural sense of this term is "to chance; to fall out; to take place by accident." But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean "happen to take place"—that is, "to originate," under which sense the President would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean also, without violence to the sense, "happen to exist," under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me the most accordant with the letter of the Constitution, the second the most accordant with its reason and spirit.

The Attorney-General goes on to say:

> This seems to me the only construction of the Constitution which is compatible with the spirit, reason, and purpose, while at the same time it offers no violence to its language. And these I think are the governing points to which all sound construction looks. The opposite construction is perhaps more strictly consonant with the mere letter, but it overlooks the spirit, reason, and purpose, and, like all constructions merely literal, its tendency is to defeat the substantial meaning of the instrument and to produce the most embarrassing inconveniences.

It would be difficult to find anywhere a criticism more applicable to those who now in their opposition to the gubernatorial right of appointment are endeavoring to defeat the substantial meaning of the Constitution and produce the most embarrassing inconveniences.

A similar case arose during the administration of President Jackson, in relation to the appointment of a register for the land office for the Mount Salus district, in the State of Mississippi. Attorney-General Taney sustained the right of the President to appoint to fill a vacancy which had "happened" during a session of the Senate, but "existed" after it had adjourned. In that case it was held to be the intention of the Constitution that offices created by law, and which are necessary to the operations of a government, should always be full, and that when vacancies "happen" they shall not be protracted beyond the time necessary for the President to fill them. The Attorney-General, in placing a construction upon the word "happen" as it appears in the Constitution, states as follows:

This appears to be the common sense and natural import of the words used They mean the same thing as if the Constitution had said "if there happen to be any vacancies during the recess." (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 2, page 528.)

In the Administration of President Tyler in 1841 the question was again raised, and Attorney-General Legaré took the same view of the Constitution in this connection as his predecessors. It is interesting, however, to note that he even advanced a step further, and advised that the President has the right to make an appointment to fill a vacancy which existed after a session of Congress intervened, to which a nomination could have been made. In the syllabus of that opinion the principle is stated as follows:

The Constitution authorized the President to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, even though the vacancy shall occur after a session of the Senate shall have intervened. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 3, page 673.)

Attorney-General Mason advised President Polk, in 1846, to the same effect, in the following words:

Even though the vacancy occurred before the session of the Senate, if that body, during its session, neglected to confirm a nomination to fill it, the President may fill it by a temporary appointment; and public considerations seem to require him to do so. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 4, page 523.)

Thus not only is the President declared to have the power, but it is declared to be his duty, from public considerations, to see that the public offices are kept filled.

The same question was raised by President Lincoln, with his Attorney-General, in 1862, on the question of his power to fill a vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court during a recess of the Senate, which vacancy existed during and before the last session of the Senate, and the right of the President to fill such vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court was sustained by Attorney-General Bates. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 10, page 357.)

Again, in the case of Peter McGough, appointed by President Lincoln as collector of internal revenue for the Twentieth district of Pennsylvania, it was declared by the Attorney-General that where the President made a temporary appointment of a collector of internal revenue during a recess of the Senate, and no nomination was made during the next regular session, or during an extra session called thereafter, that the President, after the adjournment of the extra session, might fill the vacancy by a second temporary appointment. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 2, page 179.)

Thus the power of the Executive was advanced another step, and it was the opinion of the Attorney-General that he could make a second appointment even after the lapse of two sessions of the Senate, to neither of which the nomination had ever been sent. On the same principle the power of a governor of a State to appoint a Senator is inexhaustible. It has been argued that his power is exhausted by its first exercise. On the contrary, he can appoint as often as there is a vacancy. If a legislature again fails to elect, it is his right and duty to appoint again after their adjournment.

One important distinction is to be borne in mind, however. As set forth by Attorney-General Stanbery, in 1866, a distinction is made between a temporary appointment by the President, without the consent of the Senate, and an appointment for a full term, made with the consent of the Senate. A similar distinction obtains between the appointment by an executive to fill a vacancy in the United States Senate, in which the governor does not give full title to the office, but makes only a temporary appointment until the legislature can make an election. The following is the language of the Attorney-General in this connection:

I say by the temporary appointment of the President; for, in strict language, the President can not invest any officer with a full title to the office without the concurrence of the Senate. Whether the President appoints in the session or in the recess, he can not and does not fill the office without the concurrence of the Senate. He may fill the vacancy in the recess, but only by an appointment which lasts until the end of the next session. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 12, page 41.)

Similar constructions have been adopted by succeeding Attorneys-General; by Attorney-General Williams, in 1875; by Attorney-General Devens, in 1877, and by the same Attorney-General in 1880, when he advised the Secretary of the Treasury on the question, raised by the appointment of John F. Hartranft as collector of the port at Philadelphia; by Attorney-General Brewster, in 1883, and by Attorney-General Miller, in 1889, who advised President Harrison that the rule is the same as to the power of the President to fill a vacancy in the case of an office created but not filled during the session of the Senate which had adjourned. In discussing the question, the Attorney-General, among other things, says:

The word "vacancy" in the Constitution refers to offices, and signifies the condition where an office exists of which there is no incumbent. It is used without limitation as to how the vacancy comes to exist. The vacancy may have occurred by death, resignation, removal, or any other cause, but, regardless of the cause or manner of the existence of the vacancy, the power is the same. In the case submitted the law has created the office. The office therefore exists. There is no incumbent. There is, therefore, a vacancy, and the case comes under the general power to fill vacancies. (Opinions of Attorneys-General, vol. 19, page 263.)

The only opinion dissenting from the construction adopted by the Attorney-General was in 1868, when Judge Cadwalader, of the United States district court of Pennsylvania, took a different view of the law. This opinion of the district court has not been followed either by subsequent Attorneys-General or by the courts. Some ten years later, in 1880, Mr. Justice Wood, of the United States Supreme Court, while sitting in Georgia, repudiated the position of Judge Cadwalader in a well-considered opinion, in which he states, inter alia:

The only authority relied on to support the other view is the case decided by the late Judge Cadwalader, the learned and able United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. It is no disparagement to Judge Cadwalader to say that his opinion, unsupported by any other, ought not to be held to outweigh the authority of the great number which are cited in support of the opposite view, and of the practice of the Executive Departments for nearly sixty years, the acquiescence of the Senate therein, and the recognition of the power claimed by both Houses of Congress. I therefore shall hold that the President had constitutional power to make the appointment of Bigby, notwithstanding the fact that the vacancy filled by his appointment first happened when the Senate was in session.

This decision further holds that "happens" means "happens to exist" as used in the Constitution. (In re Farrow, 3 Federal Reporter, 112.)

It will be observed that the word "happen" in all of the opinions and cases above cited was construed to be used in the sense of "happens to exist," and it was held to apply to all kinds of vacancies, whether the vacancy happened or occurred by death, resignation, removal, the beginning of the term of a new office, where no incumbent had either been elected or appointed, or the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term. No distinction was made in the kind of a vacancy to be filled, and it was uniformly held that the power to appoint was complete when the vacancy happened to exist, without reference to the manner in which or time when the vacancy occurred. It will be observed that no distinction is made as to whether these vacancies occurred prior to a session of Congress or during a session of Congress. In every case, including that of an office newly created, it was held to be the power and the duty of the President to keep the public offices filled. In the opinion of the Supreme Court, already referred to, it was said that this interpretation of the word "vacancy" has been acquiesced in by the Senate, and has been recognized, in fact, by both Houses of Congress. The Senate acquiesces by the mere fact that it gives consideration to such temporary executive appointments, and, in case of official nominations to the Senate, in its act of confirmation it ratifies their legality when it completes the executive act and constitutes the permanent appointment for the full term.

Can Senators adopt two interpretations of the word "vacancy" in the same day, or even in the same hour? Can they apply one interpretation to the word "vacancy" when it occurs in the Constitution in connection with Senatorial vacancies? Can they in open legislative session expound their arbitrary definitions and qualifications and restrictions concerning these vacancies, and, a few moments, perhaps, afterwards, in the secrecy of an executive session, give an entirely different construction to the word "vacancies" in connection with vacancies in offices filled by the President? In fact, we then give the broadest and most liberal interpretation to the word "vacancies" in this latter connection in order that the paramount purpose of good and efficient government and the obvious meaning of the Constitution may be carried out that the public offices may be filled. This principle has been acquiesced in by the House, which has always recognized the authority of officials so appointed to such vacancies, and, in the act of making appropriations for the salaries and expenditures of such officials, distinctly and emphatically acknowledges the validity of their title.

There is a third and last place in which the word "vacancy" occurs in the Constitution, and the construction which has been placed upon it throws considerable light upon the interpretation of the word "vacancy" in connection with Senatorial appointments. Clause 4 of section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States provides:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State, the executive thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

A case in point occurred in the State of Rhode Island. William A. Pirce was declared by the general assembly of that State to have been on November 4, 1884, elected a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress. The National House of Representatives on January 25, 1887, resolved that he was not elected; that the seat was vacant; and that neither he nor any other person received a majority of the legal votes cast at the election on November 4, 1884. This, then, was a case of the people of that district having failed to elect a Congressman. The question was then raised before the Supreme Court, whether, under the provisions of article 1 of section 2 of the Constitution of the United States, already referred to, the governor should issue a writ for a special election to fill the vacancy. It was contended in that case that it was not such a vacancy as was contemplated by the provisions of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held that it was a vacancy within the meaning of article 1, section 2, and the governor had power to issue a writ of election to fill the same. (In re Representation Vacancy, 15 R. I., 621.)

It will be, of course, argued, as it has been in the past, that these cases of vacancies in reference to executive appointments and vacancies happening in the House of Representatives are not similar to those vacancies occurring in the office of Senator. It is said that there are no words of limitation as is found in the provisions regarding Senatorial vacancies in the words "by resignation or otherwise." But, if the argument is good that these are not words of limitation, this objection falls to the ground. It is difficult to see how, except by the most strained construction, Senatorial vacancies are not upon a precisely similar basis as vacancies occurring in an appointive office or in the House of Representatives. The office is vacant; the Constitution of the United States intended that all the offices of the Government should be filled. Some Senator has said in past years that the Constitution abhors a vacancy as nature abhors a vacuum.

It is essential to the very purpose of government that vacancies should be filled. Reference is made to a provision in the constitution of Pennsylvania relative to the filling of vacancies. Article 2, section 4, of the State constitution, provides as follows:

> In case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator from this commonwealth, in a recess between sessions, the governor shall convene the two houses, by proclamation, on notice not exceeding sixty days, to fill the same.

In considering this provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania, it is observed that the Federal Constitution is the supreme law of the land and of paramount authority in all matters, including the duties of Federal, State, and other public officers. The chief executive of any State can follow any rule of official action prescribed by the Federal Constitution to the exclusion of a different rule prescribed by the constitution and laws of his State. It therefore follows that when a vacancy happens to exist during the recess of the legislature of any State in the office of United States Senator, the executive thereof may make a temporary appointment under the clause of the Constitution which has been so fully considered, until the next meeting of the legislature, even if the constitution of the State provides a different method for the filling of vacancies. Section 2, article 6, of the Constitution of the United States, provides as follows:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

This provision of the Constitution has been from time to time liberally construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The governor of a State has authority under section 2 of article 2 of the Federal Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, to fill vacancies that exist, and that authority is supreme and paramount to any State regulation. In other words, the provision of the Pennsylvania State constitution in reference to calling an extra session of the legislature to fill a vacancy in the office of United States Senator can not abrogate or annul the provision of the Federal Constitution under which the executive makes temporary appointments to fill vacancies. It is true that clause 1 of section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States provides that:

> The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

It is to be noted, however, that this provision applies to "elections" and not to "temporary appointments" to fill vacancies. Section 2 of article 1, as we have seen, expressly gives the power of temporary appointment to the governor and not to the legislature. The State legislature does not have, under the Federal Constitution, the power to make "temporary appointments." This power is solely lodged in the governor. As the Federal Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and each governor swears supreme allegiance to it, the Federal and not the State constitution must govern on this question. If, for example, the constitution of Pennsylvania expressly provided that the Governor of the State should not make temporary appointments to fill such vacancies, it is evident that this provision, being directly in conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, would be void, and it would become the duty of the governor, when the emergency arose, to appoint. It is possible to put a strained and technical interpretation on the words in the constitution of Pennsylvania "in a recess between sessions," to the effect that the meaning of this provision was intended especially, and perhaps only, to cover the case of a vacancy that originated after an adjournment. The word "recess" is not used in its unrestricted sense, as in the Federal Constitution, but is limited and restricted by the words "between sessions."

If we are to indulge in the strict and technical construction contended for by the opponents of the validity of the executive appointment now under discussion, there is ample reason for doubt whether under this provision of the constitution of Pennsyvania, the governor of that State had any authority to convene a session of the legislature in this particular case of Mr. Quay. The section referred to provides that the governor shall convene the two houses in case of a vacancy in the office of United States Senator in a recess between sessions, but the present vacancy originated some time before the legislature of Pennsylvania had adjourned. It is, therefore, more than a vacancy in a recess between sessions; it is a vacancy during a considerable period of the legislative session and extending into a recess between sessions. It might be well argued by our strict constructionist friends that the constitution applies only to vacancies originating in a recess between sessions, and that the constitution of Pennsylvania never intended to impose upon the governor of Pennsylvania the necessity of convening a legislature soon after its final adjournment, which had failed after continued and protracted efforts to elect a Senator, and which by the admission of all parties and factions to the controversy could not possibly come together on such a basis of agreement as would bring about the majority required to elect a Senator. In other words, the constitution of Pennsylvania declared that the governor should call an extra session where a vacancy originated while the legislature was not in session, but the constitution never intended to apply this provision to vacancies occurring during the session of the legislature, which the legislature had been unable to fill.

It may be assumed for the sake or argument, however, that the clause does fairly include a case of vacancy originating during a session and continuing after an adjournment. The meaning of the clause, however, can not certainly be to deny to the governor the power committed to him by the Federal Constitution to make temporary appointments. It evidently refers to elections and not to temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature. If it does not cover the case of temporary appointments, and takes from the governor the power to make such temporary appointments, and lodges it in the legislature, then it is in palpable and direct conflict with the Federal Constitution and is therefore void, as the latter is the supreme law of the land.

The Federal Constitution does give the State the right to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, but this provision can not affect the right of temporary appointments. In fact, it is evident that the State constitution means that the legislature should be reconvened in extraordinary session to elect for the ensuing term a Senator, but until such meeting takes place it does not in any way affect the validity of the governor's temporary appointment theretofore made. The only question that can arise, therefore, is not as to the authority of the governor to appoint, assuming that we admit such authority, for a vacancy of this character, under the terms of the Constitution of the United States, but whether this Senate is to look into the local question as to whether the governor has properly performed his duty under the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania in calling an extra session of the legislature, in accordance with the terms of that instrument. It would seem as if there could be no dispute as to the proposition that the Senate would not consider this question.

A power granted by the Constitution of the United States can not be interfered with by any State regulation, constitutional or statutory. Therefore, nothing in the constitution of Pennsylvania can conflict with whatever right the governor may have to make temporary appointments, and, as a matter of fact, nothing therein does so conflict. Whether the governor has exercised proper discretion under the State constitution as to calling the legislature is purely a local question for the people of Pennsylvania. As a matter of fact, just when and under what circumstances the legislature is to be convened in extra session for the purpose of filling a vacancy in the office of United States Senator under the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania must be decided by the executive. The power vested in the governor to convene the legislature on extraordinary occasions must always be exercised in a manner to carry out the intent of the framers of the constitution and with due regard to the practical exigencies of the occasion. If, however, any question of construction arises by which it is necessary to decide whether the occasion has arisen for the exercise of this extraordinary power, the executive himself must decide it, and his decision must necessarily be final and conclusive. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, section 41, and following, states the rule thus:

It follows, therefore, that every department of the Government and every official of every department may at any time, when a duty is to be performed, be required to pass upon a question of constitutional construction. Sometimes the case will be such that the decision when made must, from the nature of things, be conclusive and subject to no appeal or review, however erroneous it may be in the opinion of other departments or other officers; but in other cases the same question may be required to be passed upon again before the duty is completely performed. The first of these classes is where, by the Constitution, a particular question is plainly addressed to the discretion or judgment of some one department or officer, so that the interference of any other department or officer, with a view to the substitution of its own discretion or judgment in the place of that to which the Constitution has confided the decision, would be impertinent and intrusive. Under every constitution cases of this description are to be met with; and, though it will sometimes be found difficult to classify them, there can be no doubt, when the case is properly determined to be one of this character, that the rule must prevail which makes the decision final.

We will suppose, again, that the constitution empowers the executive to convene the legislature on extraordinary occasions, and does not in terms authorize the intervention of any one else in determining what is and what is not such an occasion in the constitutional sense: it is obvious that the question is addressed exclusively to the executive judgment, and neither the legislative nor the judicial department can intervene to compel action if the executive decide against it, or to enjoin action if, in his opinion, the proper occasion has arisen.

The constitution of Pennsylvania provides no alternative mode of calling the two houses if the Governor fails to do so. He is the chief executive officer of the State, and within the scope of executive power his acts are as exclusive as are the judgments of any court. Upon this point I shall quote the opinion of the present attorney-general of Pennsylvania, Hon. John P. Elkin, as set forth in a brief presented by him to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the present case:

Under the provisions of the constitution of Pennsylvania in reference to the convening of the legislature in extra session for the purpose of electing a person to fill a vacancy in the office of United States Senator, two questions may very properly arise:

1. Whether or not the governor is required to convene the legislature in extra session to elect a person to fill a vacancy in the office of United States Senator, which vacancy occurred during the regular session of the legislature which had the opportunity of electing a Senator, but failed to do so; or, whether this provision of the constitution requires the governor to convene the legislature in extra session for this purpose only when the vacancy occurs in the recess and at a time when the regular session did not have the opportunity of making a choice to fill the vacancy.

2. The second question which naturally arises is as to the time when the extra session shall be convened, if convened at all. It is contended, on one side, that the extra session should be convened immediately upon the adjournment of the regular session. On the other hand, it is contended that the governor can exercise a discretion as to the time when the extra session shall be convened; that is to say, it may be called at any time between the adjournment of the last regular session and the meeting of the next biennial session by giving proper notice of the time when the extra session is to be convened. The very fact, however, that these two questions are raised under the provisions of our Constitution makes it necessary that the power of decision should be vested somewhere. It is only fair to state that able lawyers divide on both of the questions hereinbefore stated. Who under the Constitution is to place upon this provision a construction that will be conclusive? These are questions that address themselves to a single department of the State government; that is, the executive. The governor, who is elected by the people and who is responsible to them for his acts, and who issues the mandates in calling the legislature together, must necessarily decide what is a proper construction to be applied in the exercise of this extraordinary power. Under the Constitution and laws of our State, there is no other authority to pass upon these questions. When, therefore, the governor, in placing a construction upon this provision says that the Constitution does not mean that an extra session shall be called when the vacancy occurs during a regular session, his decision, under the authority hereinbefore cited, must be conclusive.

The same principle applies in the disposition of the second question. When the executive, in the performance of his duty and the exercise of a reasonable discretion invested in him, decides that he has the right to call an extra session of the legislature at any time between the adjournment of the last legislature and the convening of the next biennial session, by giving proper notice, his decision in this respect must necessarily be conclusive. It may be contended that the construction placed upon the Constitution is not the proper one, but it will be admitted that there must be, in every form of government, some officer or tribunal whose duty it is to finally determine all doubtful questions. In this instance it is plainly the duty of the executive, and he believed that the provision of the Constitution under consideration should receive a reasonable and rational construction.

In the exercise of his discretion he did not feel called upon to convene the legislature in extra session to fill a vacancy at the very time the regular session was balloting day after day for the purpose of electing a United States Senator. In his opinion it seemed like a foolish and futile thing to convene the extra session after the regular session had exhausted all possible efforts to make an election. In this case the regular session continued to ballot for many weeks after the vacancy occurred without producing a result. During the several months the legislature was convened in regular session it became evident that it would be impossible for a majority to agree upon any candidate. If it had been called together in extra session the result would have been the same, and there would have been no election. The vacancy, in all human probability, would have existed after the calling of an extra session, just as it did after the regular session had made every possible effort to elect a Senator. The calling of an extra session would mean the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars of the public funds; and, with the partisan and factional feeling engendered during the several months of the regular session, no election would have resulted.

Under these circumstances, the executive, in the exercise of his discretion, held that the constitution did not require him to convene the legislature in extra session. The vacancy, however, still continued to exist, and, under the authority of the Federal Constitution, a temporary appointment was made. The executive of the State was the only authority called upon to place a construction upon this constitutional provision, and he has done so, and his decision upon this question, whether it be a correct or an erroneous one, under the authorities is held to be final and not subject to review.

The supreme court of the State of Colorado, in passing upon a question of kindred character, states the rule as follows:

"Whether or not an occasion exists of such extraordinary character as demands a convention of the general assembly in special session, under the provisions of section 9, article 4, of the constitution, is a matter resting entirely in the judgment of the executive." (9 Colorado, 642.)

Much has been said upon the precedents of the Senate upon the question of appointments by the executives. The precedents have been conflicting. There have been 138 appointments of Senators by the executives in the history of the Senate. Of these appointments many were unquestioned. On the other hand, in a certain number of cases, objection has been raised to the credentials for various reasons, and the question involved has been passed upon by the Senate. Many of the precedents of the Senate have been admittedly decided strictly upon party lines, and must be considered as partisan decisions. There has recently arisen a determination on the part of some to consider the recent decisions as concluding the Senate from even further debate upon this question and to insist that Senators should vote hereafter according to the precedents in the Mantle and Corbett cases.

When we consider the changing positions which Senators now in this body have occupied in their votes upon these and other cases, and when we recall the narrow and questioned vote by which the Mantle case was decided, and the fact that the Corbett case is hardly recalled as a precedent, owing to certain features therein, it is difficult to imagine that Senators will insist that their votes upon the present case are bound by any doctrine of stare decisis or by any principle of consistency on their part. The well-recognized doctrine of stare decisis, especially as it can apply at all to the Senate, was so ably expounded by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in his speech in the Corbett case, that I shall only refer to it here, and shall content myself with the statement that the Senate is a political body, that it is not bound strictly by precedents, and that, in any event, it can easily be shown that the progressive development of all the precedents of the Senate are in the line of such liberal construction of the Constitution as will recognize the validity of appointments made by a governor when a legislature has had an opportunity to elect.

Unquestionably in the early history of the Government there were precedents in favor of a contracted and illiberal construction of the clause which gives the governor the right to appoint Senators. I have not seen a better or more lucid classification of the character of these narrow constructions, indicating as it does the nature of the much-talked-of Senate precedents, than that made by the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in his speech in the Mantle case. He defines the historical development of four limitations attempted to be set up upon the language of the Constitution pertaining to the gubernatorial power to make temporary appointments. The first limitation was that the governor could not appoint to fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of a Senatorial term. The word "happen" was construed to mean a vacancy happening in a term after that very term had once been filled. That was an old and prevalent contention. Secondly, the limitation was contended for that there could be no appointment by a governor in anticipation of a vacancy. In other words, the governor of a State undertaking to exercise the power of appointment must wait until the vacancy actually happened, and no matter how certain the vacancy might be, no matter how sure the governor might be that a vacancy would exist on a particular day, with no possibility of filling it by means of the legislature, nevertheless he could not make the appointment, but must wait until the vacancy actually happened and then make the appointment at the seat of government of his State, and let the place remain vacant until the appointee could reach Washington. Thirdly, the limitation was set up, and it is now under discussion, upon the power of the executive, to the effect that it could not be exerted where the legislature of the State had had an opportunity to fill the vacancy and had failed from any cause to do it. Finally, the fourth limitation has been contended for, necessarily resulting from the third, that after a governor had once made an appointment his appointee could only hold his office until the next meeting of the legislature, and, if the legislature failed to elect, the governor could not make a second appointment. The Senator goes on to say:

These are, I believe, all the limitations which have been put upon the power of gubernatorial appointments at any time during the one hundred years of our governmental history. But they have never prevailed as admitted and undisputed restrictions. They have always been contested, debated, and rebated, and have never become established constitutional or parliamentary law. On the contrary, by advancing toward a broad and liberal construction of the Constitution, we have gone on step by step to enlarge the scope of gubernatorial appointments and to allow such appointments to be made where the advocates of the old doctrine would not agree to tolerate them. In the first place, we have allowed many appointments by governors at the beginning of Senatorial terms. Senators are familiar with the cases. Beginning with the case of Cocke, of Tennessee, in 1797, and coming down to the case of Pasco, in March, 1883, there have been thirteen cases where the governor has appointed a Senator to take his seat at the beginning of a Senatorial term, and in each case the Senator has been admitted to his seat. By these precedents we have utterly destroyed the old notion that a vacancy can not possibly happen in a term unless that very term has once been filled. Secondly, the Senate has come to allow an appointment to be made by a governor in anticipation of a vacancy. The incubus which prevented a governor from making an appointment until a vacancy actually happened, however sure he might be that it would take place, was not finally removed until the Fifty-second Congress, in 1891, when in the case of Senator Chilton, of Texas, it was deliberately determined by a unanimous report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, adopted by the Senate, that the old notion should be exploded, and that a governor, if he knew that a vacancy was to take place, and that no legislature could fill it, might make his appointment before the vacancy took place, and that the Senator might come here and hold his seat under such appointment. Thirdly, the Senate has made this further advance, in the three New Hampshire cases, and in the case of Senator Pasco, of Florida, sitting under a gubernatorial appointment, that it has consented to seat in this body a Senator appointed by a governor where there is a doubt as to whether a legislature meeting next previously to the vacancy should have chosen or should not have chosen the Senator. The fact that although a legislature may have met which was entitled to fill a Senatorial vacancy, and failed to fill it, yet there was a doubt about the right of that legislature to fill it, has been accepted as a justification of a gubernatorial appointment. So we have made three new gains from the old prohibitory notions, and we are now confronted with the question of whether, fourthly, a governor may not appoint, although a legislature which had the undoubted right to fill a vacancy has met and failed to fill it; and, fifthly, whether or not as the result of an affirmative decision upon this point, a governor may not continue to appoint as often as a legislature shall make the attempt but shall not succeed in choosing a Senator and placing him within the Senate Chamber. Having carefully considered the question whether or not this new advance should be made through a liberal construction of the clause in the Constitution giving the governors the right to make appointments, I have no hesitation, now that I am confronted with the question, in reaching the conclusion that the gubernatorial power of appointment does exist in these two remaining cases, and that Senators appointed by governors under such circumstances are entitled to admission and to their seats in the Senate.

In other words, the progress made in the precedents of the Senate has been one of steady advance. It has been a contest against a spirit of narrowness and technicality. As I stated in the beginning of my remarks, the interpretation of every word in the provisions of the Constitution concerning Senators has exhibited a progressive tendency toward liberality, in order that the evident purpose of the Constitution might be carried out, that the Senate should be kept filled. The present contention that a governor can not appoint where a legislature has had an opportunity to elect, or after having once appointed, that power is exhausted, are two of the last places left for those who by a curious persistency would desire to hamper the full representation of States in this Senate. I have no doubt, whether it shall be realized in this case, or some other, that the ultimate decision of this body will be to complete this progressive constitutional interpretation, and will recognize the intention of the Constitution to create a Senate and as a consequence to have that Senate filled; and to have that Senate filled by elections by legislatures for full terms, or remainder of terms, and by temporary appointments by governors where there are vacancies existing in the recess of the legislature.

The power of temporary appointment by the governor is as little capable of exhaustion as is the power of election on the part of the legislature. The legislature can elect as often as necessary, whenever it is able to do so. If the legislature elects a Senator, and he dies during their session, it is clear that it is their duty to elect another Senator, and so on still a third, if occasion arose during their session. No one pretends that the power of election is exhausted, and it is difficult to see how by any subtlety of reasoning it can be established that the power of the governor to make temporary appointments, a power of equal authority and validity in its sphere, can be exhausted either. The governor can appoint as often as vacancies exist, just as the President can fill vacancies in the offices of the Government. There are two salient ideas which seem to be uppermost in the minds of those who would take the narrow and technical view in opposition to the right of the governor to fill vacancies. The first idea is that in some way the legislature is nearer to the people than is the governor; that in some way a commission derived from the legislature is of higher authority and validity than that derived from the governor.

I have already shown that this contention might have some weight if the commissions were of similar character, but there seems to be a tendency to forgetfulness or to obscurity regarding the distinction already referred to between the election by the legislature for the full term, or the balance of the term, and the temporary appointment by the governor until the legislature meets. The second idea that seems to be uppermost is that some kind of a penalty should be inflicted upon a State on account of the failure of the legislature to elect a Senator. It is incredible that anyone can seriously believe, upon deliberate thought, that the Constitution intended to inflict a penalty upon the people of a State for the inability, negligence, or delinquency of their officials. Not alone is this penalty inflicted upon the State concerned, but upon the people of the whole United States, who, as already shown, are as deeply interested in having this body filled as are the people of the particular State. It would rather be supposed that it would be the intention of the Constitution, or of any sensible plan of government, in fact, to relieve and protect the people of the State from such inefficiency on the part of public officials. If a governor is found corrupt in office, and great damage results to the community, is it contemplated that the people should suffer a penalty for the delinquency of their chief official? On the contrary, impeachment proceedings are provided for to effect their future protection. Likewise with the election of Senators, if the legislature is unable to elect, the Constitution provides ample remedy by the appointment by the governor to fill the vacancy.

While it is argued that when a term is vacated by its expiration the event is certain and does not partake of the character of those causes included in the arbitrary classification of death, resignation, or otherwise, and that it is not unexpected and fortuitous in its nature, yet the facts in many cases prove an entirely different condition of affairs. The failure of a legislature to elect, as has been proven in many cases, may be unexpected a few weeks or even a few days before the meeting of the legislature, and even further than this, the legislature may have an earnest purpose to bring about an election, and yet be utterly unable to do so by reason of three parties existing in the legislature, each firmly believing in its own principles, and very properly and fairly so, and each, with equal propriety, being unwilling to surrender them. Therefore, under the provisions of the act of 1866, requiring a majority of all the members of a legislature to elect, it is obviously impossible, and not to be expected, that an election can be made by the legislature. Daily balloting are taken until the adjournment of the legislature sine die; thus a vacancy, unexpected and fortuitous, has occurred.

By the failure of the legislature to elect a Senator the State is not only deprived of its equal representation, but the will of the majority of the people is frequently completely frustrated. In Pennsylvania it is interesting to observe that the people of the State have sustained with increasing majorities the regular organization of the Republican party, which was represented in the last legislature by the Republican caucus which unanimously nominated Mr. Quay for the Senate. In 1897 the Republican candidate for State treasurer, after a campaign in which the administration of the State treasury had been directly and vigorously attacked, received 372,448 votes, and the Democratic candidate 242,731, making the Republican candidate's plurality 129,717. The vote for the Democratic candidate and all other candidates for State treasurer opposed to the Republican candidate was 412,517, making a popular majority over the Republican candidate of 49,029. It will be observed that in this election of 1897, while the Republican candidate polled an enormous plurality, he failed to poll a majority of all the votes cast.

In the following election in November, 1898, the Republican candidate for governor received 476,206 votes; the Democratic candidate, 358,300 votes, giving the Republican candidate a plurality of 117,906 votes. The vote for the Democratic candidate and all other candidates opposed to the Republican candidate for governor was 495,509 votes, making the popular majority against the Republican candidate, notwithstanding his enormous plurality, 19,303 votes. While the leading candidate failed to poll a majority of the whole vote, the majority against him of all candidates was actually 30,000 votes less than that for State treasurer in the preceding campaign. In the election of 1899 a State treasurer was elected. The Republican candidate ran upon a platform which contained an emphatic indorsement of Mr. Quay and declared that—> our State is entitled to full representation in the United States Senate, and we indorse the action of the governor in making his appointment to fill a vacancy caused by the failure of the last legislature to elect.

Upon the question of the adoption of the platform in the State convention, containing this emphatic indorsement, the vote had been 192 to 49, indicating a practical unanimity in the convention. The campaign involved the attacks upon the management of affairs by the Republican party, which had been vigorously made in the two preceding campaigns, and, in addition, the issue was squarely fought out upon this plank in the platform as to the indorsement of Mr. Quay. The vote for the Republican candidate for State treasurer, elected in November, 1899, was 438,000 votes. The vote for the Democratic candidate was 327,512 votes, making the Republican candidate's plurality 110,488 votes. The vote for the Democratic candidate and all other candidates opposed to the Republican candidate was 352,488; thus giving the Republican candidate an actual majority of all the votes cast of 85,512 votes.

I called attention above to the fact that in the two preceding campaigns, with the enormous pluralities, the candidates of the Republican party failed to poll an actual majority. I called attention to the fact that while the State treasurer in 1897 had a popular majority against him of over 49,000 votes, that this majority was cut down 30,000 at the ensuing election for governor. Now, with the issue fairly made upon a candidate for State treasurer, with the added issue made the leading feature of the campaign upon Mr. Quay and the plank in the platform of the Republican party indorsing his appointment, in an off year, with every opportunity for party dissatisfaction and reaction, after three years of agitation and unlimited opportunities for publicity, the final result has been the polling of an enormous actual majority for the Republican party and an indorsement of the Republican platform, with this plank indorsing the appointment by the governor. One of the most striking features of the results in the last election for State treasurer, following upon the adjournment of the legislature, is the fact that in the counties of Pennsylvania from which had come the bolting Republicans the candidate for State treasurer received enormous gains. I refer to these facts to illustrate the statement that the governor of Pennsylvania in making this appointment, having a due regard for his individual responsibility to the people of the State, has been sustained by them, and that in sending these credentials to the Senate it can be fairly claimed that he acts in accord with the sentiment of the great majority of the people of Pennsylvania.

The purpose of the Constitution of the United States to provide in certain instances secondary methods of filling an office is well illustrated by the provision made in article 12 of the Constitution, known as the twelfth amendment, relative to the election of President, which, after declaring the way in which electors shall meet and ballot, reads as follows:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote: a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

The Constitution in this instance even goes further and provides still a third method of filling the office of President in case of the failure of the House of Representatives to elect, by providing

> And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

In the same way, with reference to the Vice-President, it is provided

> The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President.

Twice in the history of the country has the electoral college failed to make an election, and the House of Representatives has been called upon to elect. This failure occurred when Jefferson was elected and when the second Adams was elected. No one has ever attempted to maintain that the people of the United States should suffer by having the office of President vacant by reason of any supposed delinquency on the part of the Presidential electors in not being able to elect a President. No one has ever challenged the full authority of the House of Representatives to make an election after such failure. The case is precisely the same with the failure of a legislature to elect a Senator. The Constitution has provided two methods of equal authority under which the Senatorial office can under nearly every circumstance be kept filled.

The proposition that the Constitution provides for the election of Senators for a term or for the remainder of a term and for the temporary appointment of Senators in case of vacancies until the legislature meets and elects is simple and direct. On the other hand, any proposition which involves any limitations arbitrarily set up, based upon refinement and technicality, upon the right of the executive to appoint, involves the question in confusion and obscurity. More than this, it has been the chief reason why so many of these cases are valueless as precedents, because they have been open to the charge of having been decided upon partisan or factional lines. The moment we attempt to define and to restrict and to limit the executive power of temporary appointment to fill vacancies we open the door for discrimination and distinction in each particular case. These cases of executive appointment will never be settled in this Senate until they are settled upon the plain, common-sense principle of recognizing the right of the State to be represented, the paramount purpose of the Constitution to keep the Senate full, and the power of the legislature and the governor, in their respective spheres, to contribute to that end. Until that is done these cases will always be involved in partisan and personal considerations. They will be acted upon from very much the same party and personal motives as exist in the decision of a contested-election case in the House of Representatives, or formerly in the English Parliament, before the abuses became so great that the high prerogative of judging of the qualifications of its own members was taken away from Parliament and referred to the courts. That the plain and simple proposition now contended for will be the ultimate decision and practice of this Senate I have no doubt whatever.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are three fundamental rules applicable to the construction of an instrument, rules grounded on the clearest reasons and acknowledged as elementary.

Their relative importance is in the order in which I state them:

First. If the paragraph or section, giving the words their usual and natural meaning, clearly indicate the purpose, that purpose must be adopted.

Second. If the meaning is not clear from the words used, giving them their natural significance, then the section should be considered in connection with other sections of the same instrument bearing upon the same subject.

Third. If the application of both of these rules fail to elucidate its object or intent, then and then only recourse may be had to the debates, discussions, and other surrounding extraneous conditions.

Strange as it may seem, Mr. President, this last rule, acknowledged alike in reason and in elementary law works to be the weakest, the most unsatisfactory, and its use justified only when the others absolutely fail, has been given more prominence, more elucidation, more time than either or both of the more important rules.

I know the application of this latter rule; the weaker is naturally the most popular. It is so easy to conjecture the innumerable things that might have been contemplated by the authors of any written instrument, because when you enter that realm of metaphysics your way is impeded by no barrier; the boundless expanse of infinity is before you; you can embellish your arguments with a boundless variety of conjectures limited only by the finite power of an elastic imagination. I am nevertheless not prepared to adopt the view of those Senators who go to the other extreme and assert that the section is so plain, so clear, that it requires none of the rules of construction to ascertain its true purpose.

The very construction which these same reasoners place upon the word "otherwise" annihilates their claim, for that word in its usual sense is nearly the equivalent of the two words "other ways," which will include any other way, while they insist its meaning should be restricted to cases of like character to the word "resignation."

Mr. President, the section is ambiguous, as is clearly evidenced by the diverse conclusions of so many eminent attorneys. I wish therefore to approach this question not as an attorney desiring to impress upon a court a construction in harmony with a preconceived desire, but with unbiased wish only to fathom the real intent of the framers.

The whole question depends upon the meaning of but two words—"otherwise" and "happen." Giving both their broadest use, we may be able to support the claim of Senator Quay to a seat. Giving to "happen" its natural meaning or to the word "otherwise" its restricted sense, either the one or both, defeats this claim.

I desire in the few remarks I shall make upon the matter under discussion to avoid as much as possible traversing grounds already amply discussed by various members of this body. I have listened with great interest to and have derived much instruction from those learned debates, which have so fully presented all the conceivable benefits desirable from adopting one construction and all the conceivable injuries and disasters from following the other.

The great bulk of all the discussions has been directed toward the presentation of those extraneous reasons for adopting this or that construction.

These facts and conditions have been so fully presented that it seems to me unnecessary to prolong the discussion upon that important element which does and should have its proper weight in arriving at a just interpretation, and justifies me in confining my remarks to an analysis of the section itself, believing that it inherently furnishes sufficient material for its own construction—the scales to weigh its meaning, the standard to measure its length and breadth—the scope of its application.

As we arrive at the genus or species of a plant by careful and distinct separation of calyx and corolla, of sepals, petals, stamens, and pistil, so may we generally arrive at the true though somewhat obscured meaning of any paragraph or section which has been built up from any general first impression or idea by successive additions or modifications by going back to that first idea or impression and then considering separately each modification or addition and its object, for what purpose, and to what extent it was intended to modify.

Mr. President, the provision in the Constitution before us for construction is one relating to the power of the executive of a State to make an appointment for the purpose of filling a vacancy in the United States Senate caused by the expiration of a term of office of a Senator and where an intervening legislature of a State from which the appointment is made has failed to elect.

This provision is as follows:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

My first impression was, on reading this section as applied to the case under consideration, and without an examination into its history and the conditions and arguments concerning its adoption, that the word "happen" was equivalent to the word "occur," and that the word "otherwise" included all possible causes of vacancy. A closer analysis of the section itself, and especially of its development in the Constitutional Convention, and the causes and reasons governing its changes, have led me to change the views which I first entertained.

I desire now to explain my present views and the reasons for my conclusions.

Like the interpretation of any legal instrument, the rule of construction should be to give effect, as far as possible, to the intent of the framers of this instrument. To do this it is as necessary to consider the section in connection with others bearing upon the same subject-matter and quite proper that we should consider the debates, discussions, and surrounding circumstances which influenced the adoption of the particular section under consideration.

It had already been determined by the Constitutional Convention that the Senate should be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof. It was, therefore, clearly the intent of this Convention that the primary power for the election of Senators was intended to vest solely in the legislature. The power to elect Senators was granted to the legislature of the States, and the power to elect Representatives was granted to the people.

It must be remembered that in this Convention the rights of the individual States were jealously guarded by the members representing them.

It was carefully planned that the identity of the State should not be lost and that the influence of the smaller State was not to be overshadowed by a more powerful sister State, and so it was provided that each State should have two Senators, with equal voice and power, representing not so much the people as the sovereign State itself, and who were to be elected not by the people, but by the State acting in its corporate capacity by its duly constituted officers—the members of the legislature. On this point the intent of the framers of the Constitution is clear.

But the legislature of the State not being a continuous body, the question of probable vacancies arose, and the section pertaining to these vacancies had a very decided and progressive growth (as was very natural) from a rather extended, homogeneous, and indefinite condition to a limited and definite state.

The committee on detail had brought before the body this provision: "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature." Now, do Senators stop to consider that these few terse words contain everything that is claimed by the supporters of the power of the governor to appoint in the case at bar? Every proposition that has been made by those in support of seating Mr. Quay could have been covered and clearly covered by this clear statement as it first appeared before the committee.

If the members of that Convention had in view or in contemplation the failure of the legislature to elect, and desired to give authority to the governor to fill such vacancies and all other vacancies, I know of no words which could more tersely and briefly and yet fully grant that power than this single sentence: "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature."

Under that section, as reported by the committee on detail, as often as a legislature adjourned without election the vacancies caused thereby, over and over again, could be filled by appointment.

And if it was intended that the executive might make temporary appointment to fill any vacancy which occurred until the next meeting of the legislature, why was not this report of the committee on detail adopted?

It certainly was concise enough, couched in clear language, and yet broad enough to cover every claim, and so simple that he who runs may read and understand.

So far in the development of the law pertaining to election of Senators but two propositions appear. I am following this chronologically as it was adopted. First, that the primary power to elect is in the legislature; second, that the vacancies supplied by the executive could only last until the next meeting of the legislature. It will be noted that these two propositions have never been eliminated, but stand as the two leading features unchanged and unassailed throughout the developing process of the law and the section itself. Now, we must admit and concede that every change made in that section, after it was first reported, by the addition of words or phrases was for a specific purpose. We must further concede that as the section when first reported was as broad as it could possibly be made, the added words and phrases were all limitations and not extensions.

You can not extend a sentence or a section which is as broad as it could be possibly made and so full that it contains everything that you can possibly claim for it. It is equally clear, as shown by the evolution of this section in its embryonic development and the debates by the framers thereof, that they contemplated vacancies by resignation, because that word appeared in the development of the section itself; that they contemplated vacancies happening by refusal to accept, because that appeared in the development of the section; that they contemplated a vacancy by death, because that appeared in the plan of government as drafted by Mr. Pinckney and used as a basis for the Constitution which they were framing.

Right here I desire to call Senators' attention to the fact that these particular words, all of which they contemplated, were, every one of them, words or phrases of casualty or chance, and that "happen" was used only in connection with those words, and "otherwise," when part of them were eliminated, was supplied to take the place of those which were eliminated.

They had in contemplation vacancies caused by removal, because that feature was, as I now remember, debated. When the committee on detail reported this simple power, "Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature," the Convention immediately modified it by detailing what vacancies, and they added after the word "vacancies" the words "happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise."

I wish to call your attention to the fact that the word "happen" appears for the first time in connection with those words of casualty, those words of chance, and the section was complete without the other phrase "during the recess of the legislature" and did not appear at all when the word "happening" was first used in connection with these other words. So that it read, instead of the simple words "vacancies may be supplied," etc., "vacancies happening by refusal to accept, resignation, or otherwise may be supplied," etc.

Now, can any Senator say that with these added words it means just the same as it did? If he so claims, what reason on earth can he give for adding those words?

There is the question for us to consider. Did it mean after you had added those words just the same as it did before? If he so claims, what reason on earth can he give for adding those words? What actuated the Convention in making these additions, if it was not intended to modify the original? They did so amend it, and certainly must have intended to modify its original meaning. As amended it was sent to the committee on style, and this committee not only changed the phraseology, but they added the phrase, "during the recess of the legislature," thus further modifying the character of vacancies to those which should happen between the sessions of the legislature, and they further modified, so as to make the restriction more definite and clear, "that the executive may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature." Every step they have taken, every modification, has been toward restriction and not toward extension.

It comes back again in this modified form, which reads as follows:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

But the Convention, still further desiring to restrict the term of an appointee made by the executive, or at least to make certain that such appointment should not run beyond the time in which the primary power, the legislature, could meet again, took up the modified section and added, after the last word, "legislature," the words "which shall then fill such vacancies." The word "shall," and not "may," is used, thus showing the intent to impress the power as a duty which the legislature should perform at its earliest opportunity. Now, keeping in view that the primary power granted to the governor was to make temporary appointments to fill a vacancy until the legislature could act and not to supply the omission of the legislature, we find that in this process of developing the section some of the words became aborted because their function was performed by another word.

By these words I refer to everything that was considered either in the section or in the debates, namely, "death, resignation, failure to qualify, and expulsion," and the place of all was supplied by the word "otherwise." But as it was necessary that one of the words, expressing the cause of the condition, which, while unlike, produced like effect, a vacancy should be expressed, the word "resignation" was retained as an antecedent, and the word "otherwise" substituted for the other words and phrases. What other words and phrases? Why, the others which had at one time been either in the section itself or in the minds of the framers, as expressed in their debates. I desire to show by this that the word "otherwise" was used to take the place of those particular words which were considered.

It seems to me in the debates on this floor which I have listened to that each side of this controversy, impelled by a desire to outdo the other in landing the framers of this Constitution, have sought to accord to them minds of infinite wisdom, incapable of making an error, or of not foreseeing every contingency that might arise. Such extravagant assumption, I think, rather hinders than assists us in arriving at any proper conclusion as to their real intent.

This scheme of government was modeled after the British Parliament, and especially that portion relating to the Senate was novel, and it is not astonishing in the least that these men, no matter how thoughtful, no matter how brilliant, might not have foreseen and contemplated those desperate political conflicts, waged with such earnestness and determination of purpose as to defeat rather than accomplish an election. It is very certain that nowhere in the debates can be found anything indicating that a single member ever contemplated such condition. It is equally certain that men of their intellectual power, had they foreseen or contemplated this condition, would have made some expression about it, in some manner, and I believe would have provided with direct reference to it.

The only reasonable conclusion, therefore, which we can arrive at is that the Constitutional Convention did not contemplate this contingency. This seems to me to be so clear and so certain that controversy can hardly arise upon it, and I feel that it is a waste of time to attempt to arrive at what was their intent in reference to the condition where the legislature should fail to elect, when, as a matter of fact, we can see that they had no intent concerning it. But they did have in mind all of these other conditions or causes which might create a vacancy, and the word "otherwise" must therefore be reasonably construed to include what they did have in mind, and not what they never considered. And if it be admitted that the word "happen" was used by them in its restricted sense, "to come by chance," "to come without previous expectation," then a priori would the word "otherwise" be limited to include only the words and phrases mentioned, because the expiration of a fixed official term can not come within the category of chances.

Had this section appeared in the first instance in its entirety as we now find it in the Constitution, it might then be reasonably claimed that it should be given its broadest meaning, as including in itself any other cause of vacancies, and not simply a cause of like character. The section only selects from the list of the words discussed the word "resignation;" still we must all admit that the word "otherwise" will include death, because we say it is of like character; but there is no closer relation or likeness between death and resignation than there is between resignation and failure to elect. Likeness in words or phrases must be determined by their like impressions, and, as used, these words mentioned have in their effect the same result, namely, vacancies, and if my reasoning took me by that route I would be forced to give the word its broadest scope. My reason for arriving at the conclusion that it should be considered as including only the other words is that it is evident that the purpose of the committee on style and the Convention itself in making these additions was not to enlarge the scope of the authority to appoint, because it was incapable of greater enlargement, being absolute as it stood, but to restrict, and for the further reason which I have stated, that it never occurred to them that the members of the legislature, by reason of intense political strife, would fail to perform its function of electing a United States Senator.

I come now to the question of the construction of the word "happen." I have already given the general definition of the word "happen"—to come by chance, without previous expectation. The element of chance is generally considered wherever it is properly used. I wish to get at the intent of the members of the Constitutional Convention as evidenced solely by the first idea impressed in printed matter and as then developed. The committee on detail brought in this phrase, "vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the legislature." It will now be observed that neither the word "happen," nor the words "by resignation or otherwise," nor the words "during the recess of the legislature," appear in this phrase. It was complete without them. Without any one of the qualifying words, the phrase was complete, and gave full authority to fill any vacancies occurring at any time, and which would hold good until the close of the following session of the legislature, when the executive could again, upon a second failure to elect, appoint, because there would be a vacancy, the word "happen" not appearing in the section as first reported by the committee on detail. It is not "all vacancies which may happen may be supplied by the executive," but it simply reads, "vacancies may be supplied by the executive."

In other words, when the section came before the Convention, with full power to make appointments whenever a vacancy occurred, the word "happen" is not found; we only find it used in connection with those other words or phrases, every one of which indicates coming by chance, namely, "death, resignation, failure to qualify, expulsion," things which were not to be contemplated as following by previous expectation at a definite time in the course of events; and when they did commence to use these words in the building up or development of this section, they used in connection therewith this harmonious word "happen," showing clearly that they used it in the sense of coming by chance, and not as claimed by many Senators, by a known expiration of an official term. Vacancies happening by refusal to accept, by resignation, by death, these are causes which happen, and not causes which are contemplated as occurring definitely upon a future day, and for the first time, with these in view and expressed, they used the word "happen" as applied to those conditions, none of which could be foreseen.

These words were put there for a purpose, so as to give the section a different meaning. Why should they have had extra words of limitation, such as "happening during the recess of the legislature," if they did not intend such words should limit, or why have these extra words or phrases if not intended to change the original meaning of the section, remembering that the power claimed is fully granted without them?

There is another reason which, independent of present views of what is the proper construction, ought to have great weight. Why should not the rule of stare decisis be invoked in this case? It not only affects property rights of the individual, but also affects great political questions, affects the foundation of our system of elections of members of this body; and when you once assail and weaken a portion of this structure you invite further modifications, threatening the very structure itself.

I desired, in the few brief sentences I have expressed, to confine myself solely to the one condition of exemplification of this section itself, because I have felt that it had already been fully and fairly considered and discussed, so far as extraneous conditions should be considered in determining its construction. I desire to say that I feel more firmly that I stand upon the right reason, and that my conviction is well founded, when I know that it is against the emotion, and is simply the result of my reasoning powers applied to the section itself. I can not follow the first impression that I had with reference to this matter without having my vote entirely out of harmony with my conscience and out of harmony with my reason.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, the fifth section of Article I of the Constitution provides:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Therefore, when a question of the election of a member of the Senate arises, the facts being presented to the Senate, the questions of law, constitutional and statutory, being considered, the final action of the Senate is in the nature of a judgment as contradistinguished from a mere legislative enactment or proceeding. I understand such to be the view of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the Du Pont case it was said:

> The simple question is: Whether the Senate, notwithstanding its decision of May 15, 1893, will now admit Mr. Du Pont to a seat?
> The majority of your committee now, as then, are of the opinion that this decision of the Senate was wrong; but the Senate is made by the Constitution the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members, and its judgment is just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency, when it is rendered by one majority as when it is unanimous.

Again the committee say:

> It is clear that the word "judge" in the Constitution was used advisedly. The Senate in the case provided for is to declare a result depending upon the application of law to existing facts, and is not to be affected in its action by the desire of its members or by their opinions as to public policies or public interest. Its action determines great constitutional rights—the title of an individual citizen to a high office and the title of a sovereign State to be represented in the Senate by the person of its choice. We can not doubt that this declaration of the Senate is a judgment in the sense in which that word is used by judicial tribunals.

If such a decision be in the nature of a judgment in the sense in which that word is used by judicial tribunals, then it follows that each finding is in the nature of a binding precedent upon the body that, sitting for the time being as a judicial tribunal, renders the judgment. It is not a judgment that may not be overruled in a succeeding case if the body that rendered the judgment changes its opinion as to its propriety; but it does constitute a precedent which, until deliberately overruled, binds the judicial tribunal that rendered it. It binds all the people of the country affected by it until there shall be a new hearing and a second consideration, upon which the judicial tribunal shall find itself willing to declare that its original judgment was erroneous, and that it must be reversed in the interest of right and justice.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] did not exactly meet the point made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] on yesterday when he undertook to treat the judgment in the case of Du Pont, as though it had been attacked in a collateral proceeding. The application and motion of Mr. Du Pont was in no sense a collateral attack upon the judgment. Du Pont came here and asked that the judgment be reopened. His motion was in the nature of an application for a rehearing. The proceeding was direct. The application was directed to the body having complete control over the subject-matter of the judgment. No condition had changed, no new right had intervened, no statute of limitation, no fixed rule of the Senate cut off the application. Therefore, it was a direct proceeding timely instituted to have a rehearing of a question over which the Senate had complete jurisdiction.

The response made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections was that the Senate sat as a court; that it undertook to judge, and did judge, great questions involving the right of the applicant, and the right of the State of Delaware, and the right of all the other States; and that upon deliberate consideration that great constitutional question had been settled, and conclusively settled. The Senate had jurisdiction to open the case, and had the right to go back and retry all those questions, and if the Committee on Privileges and Elections were of opinion that it was a precedent which did not bind in a new case, it was certainly a precedent that did not bind in the identical case in which it was made on a proper application for a rehearing by the body having complete jurisdiction, and not cut from the rehearing by a statute of limitation or by a fixed rule of Senatorial procedure.

The Corbett case followed in the wake of the Lee Mantle case. The facts, though dissimilar in many respects, did not change the principle applicable to the Lee Mantle case; yet the Senate acting upon the assumption, and the correct assumption, that the Lee Mantle decision constituted a precedent that bound the Senate, that bound all the people of the United States, that bound all the governors of the States, rejected the application of Corbett for a seat in the Senate. It rejected that application by a majority absolutely overwhelming, and yet we are told on the floor of the Senate that although the question presented by the report of the committee involved questions of constitutional law alone, that Senators were not controlled in their votes either by their convictions of what the true constitutional principle was or by the binding obligation of the precedents that had been set by the Senate, but that outside of the case, independent of the questions on which the Senate was called on to act, there were certain notorious facts, facts known in some way to Senators, which so far affected the moral standing of the applicant that their votes can be defended upon the idea that in disregarding the constitutional rule and the binding precedents they acted on the moral conviction that Corbett ought not to be seated, even though in every respect his appointment was regular and constitutional.

Now, then, there is another case, and except for the fact that that case had happened I should have contented myself with a silent vote to-day. The legislature of Kentucky at its session of 1895–96 was charged with the duty of electing a successor to the Hon. J. C. S. Blackburn, whose term of service expired on the 3d day of March, 1897. The legislature failed to make an election, and at the expiration of the constitutional period of its existence adjourned sine die, no election having been made. Mr. Blackburn served until the 3d of March, 1897. At that time the legislature of Kentucky was not in session. The governor of the State appointed the Hon. Andrew T. Wood to serve in the Senate until the legislature should elect some one to fill the vacancy created by the failure of the preceding legislature to elect. Mr. Wood appeared in the Senate with the letter of appointment by the governor of Kentucky on the 10th of March, 1897. Mr. HOAR moved that the oath be administered. Whereupon Mr. Gorman moved that his certificate of appointment, with the motion of Mr. HOAR, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That motion was carried.

The credentials went into the hands of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was then, as now, a member of that committee. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] was then, as now, the chairman of that committee. If their present contention be correct, Wood was lawfully appointed to serve as Senator until the vacancy should be filled by an election by the legislature. There has never to this day been a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to Wood's title under the appointment by the governor of Kentucky.

The motion and the credentials remained in the hands of the committee until the legislature was subsequently convened in extraordinary session by the governor, and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DEBOE] was elected. In May, 1897, more than two months after this motion to qualify Wood had been made, Mr. DEBOE appeared in the Senate and took the oath as Senator.

Now, I wish to know from the Committee on Privileges and Elections why it is that an appointment made by the governor of Pennsylvania at a time when the legislature was not in session, to fill a vacancy that happened while it was in session, is entitled to consideration at their hands, while the appointment made by the governor of Kentucky to fill a vacancy that did not happen at the time the legislature was in session, but during a recess, was permitted to sleep the sleep of death?

If Mr. Quay is entitled to be admitted as a Senator to-day, Mr. Wood was entitled then to be admitted as a Senator. Yet not only he was not permitted to be sworn in, but the Committee on Privileges and Elections pocketed his credentials, pocketed the motion to qualify him as Senator from the State of Kentucky, and he has never yet had the gratification of having an expression of opinion even from the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Massachusetts that he was legally appointed to sit as a member of this body.

As to Wood, the Lee Mantle precedent was binding and conclusive. As to Mr. Quay, the Lee Mantle decision and the Corbett decision and the nonaction in the case of Wood are to go for naught.

The Commonwealth of Kentucky is entitled to some explanation at the hands of the Committee on Privileges and Elections as to why it is that a distinction like this is made between appointments coming from the governor of Pennsylvania and appointments coming from the governor of Kentucky.

If the precedents established before the application of Wood and the precedents antedating the application of Corbett bound the Senate, bound the State of Oregon and its governor, and were conclusive on the State of Kentucky and its governor, I ask if any peculiar reasons have been or can be given why those precedents do not also bind the governor of and the State of Pennsylvania?

I do not call in question the power of the Senate to overrule any decision it may have given on any question, but I do insist that the difference in the individuals, the difference in the political complexion of the Senate, the difference in the results to be brought about, the difference in the collateral importance of seating one man over seating another, are not legitimate considerations when we are called on to overrule and set aside precedents that have been solemnly established and to establish new precedents that are to operate in the future until the political complexion of the Senate shall change or until some ulterior purpose is to be attained of so much importance that the new precedents must be disregarded as the old precedents have been set aside.

It is seriously contended that vacancies in Senatorial terms are to be treated as vacancies in executive, ministerial, and judicial offices, and that the rule of interpretation applied to the power of the President to fill up vacancies is to be applied to the power of the governors of the States, not to fill vacancies, but to make appointments, temporary in their character, and that the rule in the one case ought to govern the other.

Now, let us see about that. Certain classes of Federal officers can only be appointed by the President. They can not be elected. The Constitution provides that certain appointments shall be made by the President subject only to the advice and consent of the Senate. The Constitution provides that as to those offices, in cases of vacancies, the President shall fill up the vacancy, not make a mere ad interim appointment. He has power to fill up the vacancy, the appointee to serve until the close of the next session of the Senate. So, then, when the President appoints a judge, when he appoints a district attorney, when he appoints a commissioner of internal revenue or a collector of internal revenue, he performs an executive function, a function with which he is clothed by the very letter of the Constitution. When a vacancy happens in one of these offices, he fills the vacancy in the due exercise of executive function pure and simple, a function conferred by the express language of the Constitution.

It is not so with the appointment of a Senator to a seat in the Senate of the United States. The appointment of a legislator is not executive. The whole theory of our governments, State and Federal, is that the legislative and the executive functions shall be committed to distinct and separate bodies of magistracy; that the legislatures shall not elect the President or the governors, and that the governors or the President shall not appoint the legislatures, but that these two great departments shall at all times be kept separate and distinct, so that when the governor of a State comes to appoint a member of the highest branch of the Federal Congress he exercises a function that is in no sense executive in its character, according to American understanding. He makes the appointment in virtue of an express constitutional provision, applying only to an exceptional case; and while the power of the President is to be liberally construed, the power of a governor of a State to control by his appointments the composition of the Federal Senate is to be strictly construed, and he who comes here with an appointment from a governor and claims the right to a seat comes with the burden of showing that the exact condition existed at the time the appointment was made that the Constitution provides for.

Keeping these distinctions in mind, it will be seen at once that there may be a rule of interpretation applied to the power of the President to fill vacancies that is utterly inapplicable to the power of the governors of the States to fill up the highest branch of the Federal Legislature with their appointees. Primarily, Senators must be elected, not appointed; they must be elected by the legislatures of their States, not elected or appointed by the governors of their States.

One of the greatest contests in the Convention that framed the Constitution was as to the character of representation to be had in the Senate. The Virginia plan was to make both the Senate and the House representatives of the people as contradistinguished from the States. Members of the House of Representatives were to be chosen by the people; members of the Senate to be chosen by the legislatures of the States, but the proportion of representation was to be determined by the population of the respective States.

Under that plan Virginia would have had six or eight times as many Senators as Vermont. New York and Pennsylvania would have had two or three times as many Senators as Connecticut. The controversy between the smaller States and the greater States reached a point at which the Convention came within one step of dissolving, because the smaller States would not consent to give up their equal representation in one branch of the National Congress, and the larger States would not concede it. Recognizing the fact that the Convention was about to prove a failure, what came about? Did the majority establish the Senate with the view of keeping it full at all times, or did the Convention establish the Senate and provide that each State should have equal representation by way of concession to the smaller States, without which the whole plan of Federal Government would have failed?

I take the liberty in this connection to read from Curtis's History of the Constitution:

The basis of the House of Representatives having been thus agreed to—the remaining part of the report, which involved the basis of the Senate, was then taken up for consideration. Wilson, King, Madison, and Randolph still opposed the equality of votes in the Senate, upon the ground that the Government was to act upon the people and not upon the States, and therefore the people, not the States, should be represented in every branch of it. But the whole plan of representation embraced in the amended report, including the equality of votes in the Senate, was adopted by a bare majority, however, of the States present.

That is, the question of how the slaves should be counted as against free voters—

When this result was announced, Governor Randolph complained of its embarrassing effect on that part of the plan of a constitution which concerned the powers to be vested in the General Government; all of which, he said, were predicated upon the idea of a proportionate representation of the States in both branches of the legislature. He desired an opportunity to modify the plan, by providing for certain cases to which the equality of votes should be confined; and in order to enable both parties to consult informally upon some expedient that would bring about unanimity, he proposed an adjournment. On the following morning, we are told by Mr. Madison, the members opposed to an equality of votes in the Senate became convinced of the impolicy of risking an agreement of the States upon any plan of government by an inflexible opposition to this feature of the scheme proposed, and it was tacitly allowed to stand.

Great praise is due to the moderation of those who made this concession to the fears and jealousies of the smaller States.

Great praise is due to those, not those who established a Senate with the express intention that the membership of that Senate should always be full, but to those who conceded equal representation to the States, large and small, in order to secure the formulation of a Constitution to be submitted to the people and the States.

Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, was the leader of the party that insisted on equal representation in the Senate. He perhaps more than any other one of those who insisted that each State should have two Senators and that no State should be deprived of equal representation in the Senate without its consent was entitled to the credit of extorting that concession.

It was objected by Mr. Wilson and others that it was impolitic in any case to permit the governor of a State to fill even temporarily a vacancy in the Senate, but Ellsworth again insisted that as the legislatures met frequently no harm could come by conferring that exceptional power on the governor, as his power would be used for the appointment of men who could serve at the longest but a very short time.

Now, the first reported controversy involving the exercise of this exceptional power by the governor of a State originated in one of the smaller States. The legislature of Delaware failed to fill a vacancy. The governor of Delaware undertook to fill it by the appointment of Kensey Johns. Ellsworth, this apostle of equal representation, this man who had combated the inequality of representation on the floor of the Convention, this distinguished man who insisted on conferring the power to make temporary appointments on the governors, when he came to pass on the action of the governor of the smallest State in the Union in appointing a Senator to serve out a portion of a vacancy that the legislature had failed to fill, took ground against the contention of those who are now insisting that Mr. Quay shall be seated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kentucky suspend for one moment? The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for the further consideration of the Pennsylvania Senatorial resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LINDSAY. In the case of Kensey Johns this resolution was submitted to a vote of the Senate:

Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns.

On that question the yeas were 20, including Ellsworth, against 7 nays. So, then, we have this champion of equal representation solemnly voting in a case like the one we have at bar, only less objectionable, that the legislature having had the opportunity to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Read the governor of the State had no right to make a temporary appointment.

Thus we have the first reported case, arising under the Constitution affecting the smallest State in the Union, passed on by the special representative of the equality of the smaller States, adverse to the claim made by the friends of Mr. Quay under the appointment made by the governor of Pennsylvania.

I do not admit that it is competent to go behind the report of the committee on style to ascertain what the Convention intended the Constitution to be. We may read the speeches of members of that Convention; we may consider the votes upon the various propositions considered; we may have due regard to the gradual growth of each provision incorporated into the Constitution for the purpose of having light shed on the question we have under consideration, but we can not consider any of those matters to prove that the report of the committee on style, after having been adopted by the Convention, did not then express the exact will of that Convention.

The rule is universal that the final and concluding act of a deliberate body expresses its intent, notwithstanding any act done in the preliminary work leading up to that final act. When the Convention adopted the Constitution, as it appeared from the committee on style, it finished, it completed its work, it exhausted the authority it chose to exercise, and it was the Constitution as it came from the committee on style that was submitted to the thirteen States of the old Confederation for their adoption. When New Hampshire came to decide whether it would adopt the Constitution or reject it, when Virginia came to decide that question, when North Carolina came to decide that question, no man had the temerity to say that the committee on style, without authority, in violation of its duty, and without calling the attention of the members of the Convention to its action, had changed the phraseology of the provision as originally adopted, and thereby changed the meaning of that provision; and that hence what we have is not the Constitution the Convention submitted to the American people for ratification. No; we are to take the Constitution and its language as it left the committee on style, except where the Convention corrected the work of that committee, and we are to treat the paper that Virginia ratified, that Maryland ratified, that Delaware ratified, that Pennsylvania ratified, and that North Carolina, New York, and Rhode Island reluctantly accepted as the true Constitution of the United States.

If the language of the Constitution be plain, obedience to that language is the duty imposed on every Senator who has taken the oath to support and defend that Constitution. We are not to ask what the Constitution would have meant if one of the original provisions had been carried into effect, and we are not to ask what the Constitution would have meant if some speech made by a member of the Convention had been incorporated into the Constitution, but we are to ask, What does the language finally submitted by the Convention to the States and ratified by the States naturally mean? It means that the Representatives in the other branch of the Congress of the United States should be elected by the people, and it provides that whenever there may be a vacancy in the representation in the House of Representatives the executive of the State shall issue his writ of election to fill that vacancy, not to appoint ad interim, not to appoint temporarily, but to issue his writ for an election, of course within a reasonable time.

When we come to this end of the Capitol, we find that the legislatures are to elect, that the legislatures are to fill up the vacancies that happen from time to time, but that in a particular state of case, under a peculiar and extraordinary condition, the governors of the States shall have the power not to fill vacancies, but to make temporary appointments, the governors' appointees to serve until the legislatures shall have opportunity to fill the vacancies.

It is the established law of Congress, it is the established law of this Senate, that the legislature can not shirk the attempted performance of the duty to fill all the vacancies that may happen in the Senate of the United States. Some years ago the West Virginia legislature failed to elect. At the expiration of the term of the Senator who went out of the Senate the governor made an appointment. Then the governor called an extraordinary session of the legislature under the provision of the State constitution which authorized him to name the particular subjects on which the legislature might act, and which prohibited the legislature from acting on any other subject.

The legislature convened, and in the face of the executive action, in defiance of the executive call, proceeded to fill the vacancy then existing in the Senatorship of that State; and when the two gentlemen appeared here, one holding the certificate of the governor and the other holding the certificate of the legislature, the Senate decided, and properly, against the appointee of the governor and in favor of the appointee of the legislature, because the power of appointment resides primarily in the legislature, and the governor can not in any way or under any State authority defeat the exercise of that power.

It is not for me to say that the governor of Pennsylvania has disregarded the express provision of the constitution of his own State for any other than a proper purpose; but it is a peculiar fact that the constitution of that State, which, to say the least of it, is in harmony with the Constitution of the United States, provides for exactly the contingency we now have, that the governor, instead of attempting to fill the vacancy by a temporary appointment, shall call the legislature together in extraordinary session, and give the legislature the opportunity to make the appointment.

It is not pretended when the term of Mr. Quay expired, the legislature then being in session and then engaged in attempting to elect his successor, that a vacancy had happened which authorized the governor to make the temporary appointment; but if the governor can fill by a temporary appointment a vacancy which happens while the legislature is in session and that continues after the adjournment, what prohibits him in principle from filling it the very day the term expires, notwithstanding the fact that the legislature is in session, if that legislature persists in its refusal or its failure to discharge its plain constitutional duty? There is no reason. If Governor Stone could make this appointment after the legislature adjourned because a vacancy then existed rather than happened, it is because he has the power to fill the existing vacancy, and, having that power, could have filled it as well while the legislature was in session as after it adjourned. He exercises the power not because the vacancy has happened, but he exercises the power because the vacancy happens to exist. The vacancy happened to exist on the 5th day of March as well as it happened to exist on the 5th day of May. Therefore, if he could fill a vacancy that happened to exist at the time he made the appointment, he could fill it as well when the legislature was in session as when it was not.

As to the word "happen," I do not attach controlling force to verbal criticism. The framework of the sentence determines the meaning of the sentence rather than any technical interpretation that may be put on any particular word used in the sentence.

When we are told that none but a lawyer could discover that "otherwise" does not necessarily mean "other ways," I say none but a lawyer, none but a most astute lawyer, could discover that the phrase "when a vacancy shall happen" means "when a vacancy shall happen to exist." If a man be killed this evening in a railway collision, we say he happened to come to his death by a railroad accident, but we do not say to-morrow that he happens to be dead to-day, or that he happens to be dead the day after to-morrow. The happening of the death was coincident with the time of the death, and none but an astute lawyer could give any other meaning to the word "happen" in that connection. Then, if a Senator dies, if he resigns, if a Senator be expelled, if a Senator refuses to take the oath of office, the vacancy happens when he resigns; it happens when he dies; it happens when he is expelled; it happens when he refuses to take the oath of office; but it does not happen the day after, nor the week after, nor two weeks after. The phraseology, without any kind of technical interpretation, speaks for itself, just as I insist "otherwise" necessarily speaks for itself in the connection in which it is used in the Constitution.

If the Convention had meant to say that a vacancy coming about in any way might be filled by a temporary appointment of the governor, the word "happen" might well then have been omitted, and the word "otherwise" most indubitably would have been omitted, and the language would have read that "if a vacancy happen, it shall be filled up by the temporary appointment of the governor until the legislature shall have the opportunity of filling it."

The word "otherwise" is used for some purpose, just as the word "happen" is used for some purpose, and as to the plain people of Georgia and South Carolina and New Hampshire—I will not include Massachusetts, but I will include Vermont—when they came to adopt the Constitution it never occurred to them that the word "happen" was to have no meaning and that the word "otherwise" had better have been left out of the Constitution and was put in through a mistake of the committee on style.

But the claim is the Senate is always to be full; that is, the membership is always to be full. Wisconsin is always to have two Senators; Kentucky is always to have two Senators; Vermont and New Hampshire are always to have two Senators each. If such was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, they only halfway did their work at best.

If the legislature fails to elect and the governor be in sympathy with the legislature and fails to appoint, then the State goes without equality of representation in the Senate, and therefore it was not contemplated by the Convention itself that all vacancies should absolutely be filled up.

When the objection was made that this was a power that ought not to be conferred on the governor, Mr. Ellsworth's answer was that it was a power that would not be exercised when the legislature was to meet in a short time.

So we have a Constitution which indicates that the membership of the Senate should always be kept full, except in cases in which the legislature and the governor are in sympathy, or in cases in which the legislature will speedily convene, and it is not necessary to make an appointment.

Now, let us apply that doctrine in this case. Suppose Mr. Quay to be qualified under the governor's appointment to fill the vacancy occasioned by the failure of the Pennsylvania legislature to elect, how long is he to serve? Suppose the next legislature shall fail to elect, what then? We have decided that the section which says the appointee shall serve until the legislature shall meet, means until the legislature shall adjourn. Then suppose the next legislature of Pennsylvania meets on the first Monday in December next—I do not know whether the Pennsylvania constitution contains a limitation on the time it may sit; but suppose it sits six months, and during all that time it fails to elect, then this appointment, instead of being temporary, to operate only for a short time, until the next legislature shall meet, will be an appointment that will operate for a year; and if the same influences which prevented the election of a Senator by the last legislature of Pennsylvania shall prove strong enough to prevent an election by the next legislature, the same power that clothes Mr. Quay with the authority to sit here for a year, may, the day after the next legislature adjourns, clothe him with authority to sit until another legislature shall be elected, and have another opportunity to elect his successor.

This is not what the Constitution means. It never was contemplated that the governors of States should have any power, except of the most exceptional character, to determine who shall sit and vote as a member of the Senate. To meet a temporary exigency, to meet a state of case that it was practically impossible to provide against, to give the governor the power temporarily to fill a vacancy that might happen until the legislature could act, was all that the people and the States who adopted the Constitution ever expected to confer, or understood they were conferring, on the governors of the States.

Why have we not two Senators to-day from Pennsylvania? Why have we not two Senators from Utah? Why have we not two Senators from the State of Delaware? It is because the legislatures of those three States have declined to perform an express duty imposed on them by the Constitution of the United States in the interests of the Republic, of which each of those States is a member.

It is said we may have three parties, that we may have a disagreement in the majority party, that the majority may nominate a man for whom a minority of the party will not vote, and that, by adhering to that man who can not receive a majority of the votes, they may defeat an election by the legislature and then call on the governor to make good the wrong that they have voluntarily inflicted on the people of the State. Are we to be told that the Republican party of the State of Pennsylvania, by refusing to unite on one belonging to their own party or by refusing to vote for anyone not a member of their party, has been prevented by some extraneous cause from exercising the right conferred on the State of Pennsylvania in order to secure its equal representation in the Senate, and that therefore an extraordinary case has been brought about in which a State executive may name a member of the highest legislative body in the Union; that the whole principle of our Government, the whole theory of our Government, may be overturned, not to meet a temporary exigency, not to meet an exigency that might not have been provided against, but to enable a governor to exercise a nonexecutive function, to meet an exigency deliberately brought about by the refusal of the body charged with the duty of making the election of a Senator?

Our ancestors did not contemplate that the boon, so much esteemed, so highly prized by the States of the Union, that each should have equal representation on the floor of the Senate, would be ruthlessly thrown away out of adherence to party spirit or to personal pique, and that that being done, then the Senate of the United States would recognize the power of an executive to undertake to keep the membership of the Senate full.

If Pennsylvania has not equal representation here to-day, the fact is chargeable to the people of Pennsylvania; if Utah has not equal representation here to-day, the fact is chargeable to the legislature of Utah. So with the legislature of Delaware.

No State is to be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent; neither is any State to be compelled against its consent by the unauthorized action of the Senate of the United States to keep its membership full. That is the point we reach at last. The constitutional provisions are ample. The legislature of Pennsylvania, with a Republican majority of forty or fifty, could have elected a Senator if that legislature had chosen to do so. That legislature, by reason of local animosities, local dissensions, personal objections, or some other cause which has no lodgment in the theory of our Government, refused to perform a plain and manifest duty; and now we are asked not only to say the governor may make a temporary appointment to fill the vacancy until the legislature can have an opportunity to act, but that we are to strike from the constitutional provision the word "recess" in order that we may assist the governor to do that which under the letter of the Constitution he could not do, but which duty, if it be a duty, has been imposed on him by the deliberate refusal of the representatives of the people of Pennsylvania to discharge their plain and manifest duty.

Now, let us see what the provisions of the Constitution are:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

That is the rule as to the House of Representatives.

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year.

That much of the paragraph has ceased to be a living provision of, because all the duties provided for by that paragraph have been performed, so that taking the Constitution as it now stands it reads thus:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Now, I submit to the Senators whether or not that provision, read by any other than a technical and astute lawyer, would ever convey the impression that it did not contain all the language it was intended to contain, and that every word contained in it was necessary to express the intention of the framers of that instrument.

And if vacancies happen—

Not if vacancies happen to exist—

by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature.

If the member happens to die, if the member happens to resign, or if, on the day he ought to qualify, he happens to refuse, or if by reason of some misconduct after his election he happens to be expelled, then we have reached the point which determines whether or not it is the duty and the power of the legislature or the duty and the power of the governor to fill the vacancy. If the vacancy happens when the legislature is not in session or is in recess, then the governor makes a temporary appointment. If it happens when the legislature is not in recess, then the governor has no authority under the plain letter of the Constitution to make the appointment. The duty at once devolves on the legislature.

The Congress of the United States has undertaken to deal with this question by the act of July 25, 1866, an act to regulate the time and manner of electing Senators by the legislatures of the States. Section 17 provides:

Whenever, during the session of the legislature of any State, a vacancy occurs in the representation of any State in the Senate, similar proceedings to fill such vacancy shall be had on the second Tuesday after the legislature has organized and has notice of such vacancy.

The legislature which convenes next preceding the expiration of a regular term shall, on the second Tuesday after its organization, proceed to elect a Senator to fill that term and shall meet each day until the election is made. That is the act of Congress. If a vacancy occurs when the legislature is not in session, what then?

Whenever, on the meeting of the legislature of any State, a vacancy—

a vacancy shall exist in the representation of said State in the Senate, the legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to fill such vacancy in the manner described in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

Now, both branches of Congress had the Constitution in view when this enactment culminated into a law. The President of the United States had the Constitution in view when he approved this enactment. So, then, we have the concurrence of opinion between both branches of the Congress of the United States, supplemented by the opinion of the President of the United States, which declares how the legislature and when the legislature and what methods the legislature shall adopt in the election of a Senator to fill a full term; and then we have the provision that if a vacancy shall exist at the time the legislature convenes—not shall happen at the time the legislature convenes—the legislature, on the second Tuesday after it convenes, shall proceed to fill that vacancy. Then we have the third provision, that if the vacancy shall occur or happen during the session of the legislature then, on the second Tuesday thereafter, the legislature shall proceed to fill the vacancy.

In this case what happened? The vacancy occurred, if it did occur, or it happened, if it did happen, while the Pennsylvania legislature was in session. An act of Congress provides that on the second Tuesday, after notice thereof, the legislature shall proceed to fill the vacancy. In the language of the statute the vacancy occurred on the 4th day of March last. In the contention of those who insist that Mr. Quay ought to be seated it also happened after the legislature adjourned, although it had occurred while the legislature was in session.

I see no reason why the precedents that bound the Senate, why the precedents that controlled the Committee on Privileges and Elections, why the precedents to the binding effect of which the governor of Kentucky and his appointee had to submit, shall not apply to the State of Pennsylvania and to the governor of Pennsylvania and to the appointee of that governor, and require that State and its governor and his appointee to submit to those precedents, just as the Committee on Privileges and Elections required the State of Kentucky and its governor and his appointee in March, April, and May, 1897, to submit to the then existing precedents.

Mr. SPOONER obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to answer a question put by the Senator from Kentucky, I should like to do so.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kentucky I understood to cite the case of Capt. Andrew T. Wood, who was appointed on the 5th of March, 1897, to a vacant seat in the Senate by the governor of Kentucky. I think the Senator complained of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, naming the Senator from Massachusetts, because they had not secured the seating of Captain Wood under that appointment. Did I understand the Senator aright?

Mr. LINDSAY. That is not precisely the way I stated it. What I complained of was not that you did not do right, but that, according to your own theory as now advanced, Wood had the right to expect that you and the Senator from Massachusetts would at least submit a report that he was entitled to sit as Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator, I think, said we smothered the credentials.

Mr. LINDSAY. The committee smothered them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator to say we smothered the credentials. Mr. Wood was appointed by Governor Bradley on the 5th of March, after Senator Blackburn's term had expired, and came on to the extra session on the 10th of March. His credentials, being an appointment by the governor, were presented, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moved that he be permitted to take the oath. The Senator from Maryland, Mr. Gorman, moved that the credentials be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Senator from Massachusetts said under the circumstances he would not resist that motion. On the 13th of March the legislature of Kentucky was called in extra session. On the 28th of April Mr. DEBOE was elected, came here, and was sworn, in on an election by the legislature, on May 5.

Now, the only reason why the Committee on Privileges and Elections did not take action in that case was because there was not time enough; that is all. It was not because the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] or I had any doubt about his right to be admitted to a seat, but we had been practically notified by the Senators who maintain the opposite contention to that which we advocate that he could not be seated without a contest, and, having in mind the lengthy debate which the opponents of the seating of Captain Wood could maintain, having on their side the eloquent and diffuse Senator from Kentucky, the committee simply omitted to make a report; and the fact that they did omit to make a report, when an extra session of the legislature of Kentucky had been called, is hardly to be imputed to them under the circumstances as a delinquency.

If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I will say one word further in reply to the Senator from Kentucky in reference to his argument that this question ought to be treated as res adjudicata. The Senator from Massachusetts briefly answered the point yesterday, and I only wish to read three lines from the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in which the committee unanimously recommend the Senate to decline to reopen the Du Pont case. The Senator from Massachusetts says:

We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases.

That principle is distinctly stated. The Senator from Kentucky understands it very well, and the argument as to res adjudicata indulged in by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Connecticut, with all due respect, is not warranted by anything found or omitted in the report in the Du Pont case.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator from Wisconsin will indulge me for a moment. The point I make as to res adjudicata is that when a motion for a rehearing is pending the judgment is not res adjudicata or stare decisis. The question is whether it is correct. The point I want to get at is whether there was any notice given to the Senator in the Kentucky case that there would be a lengthy discussion, that he did not have in the Quay case, and whether or not the shortness of the time justified the Committee on Privileges and Elections in not even making a report on which Mr. Wood might base a claim for compensation and mileage, and show that he was not a mere political adventurer.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know that the Senator notified us that he would debate at great length against the right of Mr. Wood's admission, but it was perfectly well understood that he could not come in without a fight. It was not wholly the fear of opposition in the Senate; it was not largely that fear. It was the fact that a session of the legislature was almost immediately called, on the 13th of March, and if an extra session of the legislature of Pennsylvania had been called as soon, I assume the Committee on Privileges and Elections now would not have hastened to report in the case of Senator Quay.

Mr. LINDSAY. That was the same legislature which had failed to elect in the last year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes.

Mr. LINDSAY. And the point is now made that the governor of Pennsylvania could very well disregard the constitution of Pennsylvania because he would have to call the same legislature together.

Mr. CHANDLER. The governor would have had to call together a legislature that had had an opportunity to elect, that had tried a great while to elect and had not succeeded; and according to the argument of Senators on the other side, if it is good for anything—I do not think it is—the State had committed a fault in not sending a Senator here, and therefore the governor should not call the legislature together.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is exactly what the governor of Kentucky did. He called the legislature that failed to elect. He made an appointment in the interim, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections without hesitancy let Kentucky go for two months without a Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. According to Senators on the other side, it was very presumptuous, after the legislature had had a chance to elect and had not elected. The State, of course, according to their argument, should be punished by going without a Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon any elaborate discussion of the questions which are presented by this case. I simply desire, and I hope I may be permitted to do so briefly, to restate in a general way my view upon the subject in explanation of my vote. At a former session, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it became my duty to submit to the Senate a laborious and elaborate argument upon the subject. I think I need not say that it was a sincere one. It was not a partisan case at all, for there was no contestant. I was at liberty, as every other Senator almost was, to treat the subject as nova res, a case of first impression. That was the Corbett case. I reached the conclusion that Mr. Corbett was as much entitled to a seat in this body as I am, and I knew then, and so stated in the opening of my remarks, that he would not be seated.

Those who supported his claim to a seat with me were not very successful in convincing the Senate. I have flattered myself sometimes with the notion that that was partly due to the fact that comparatively few Senators listened to the speeches; and the Corbett case in that respect did not differ from this case. I did not even succeed in convincing either of the Senators from Pennsylvania—Mr. Quay or Mr. PENROSE—that, the legislature having met and failed to elect a Senator, the governor nevertheless under the Constitution had the power to make a temporary appointment. That debate and this certainly show one thing beyond question, and that is that it is a debatable proposition.

Yesterday and to-day I listened to arguments, very strong ones, against the right of Senator Quay to a seat here under this gubernatorial appointment, in which it was assumed, if not stated, that the contention is supported by the plain language of the Constitution, and that there really is but one side to the matter. I think there is hardly a clause in the Constitution which from the beginning has excited more controversy than this one relating to the appointment by the governor of a Senator. Able lawyers have discussed it on both sides, and for anyone to say now that it is a plain clause, and that its language is not susceptible of construction, because it is so plain that construction has no office to perform, is rather a poor tribute to the intelligence of the men—distinguished men, too—who during fifty years have from time to time discussed it elaborately in this body.

It is purely a constitutional question, Mr. President, and nothing else. If Mr. Quay, under the Constitution, is entitled to a seat here, he ought to have it. If Mr. Quay, under the Constitution, is not entitled to a seat here, he should be excluded. Personality has no decent part to play in this question, and I do not impugn the motive of any man who differs with me upon it.

Much time has been taken here in discussion upon the doctrine of stare decisis, and some time has been taken in discussing the doctrine of res adjudicata. They are very different to a lawyer, so different as not even to be "of kin." Res adjudicata relates to the case in judgment. Stare decisis relates to the principle. When a case has passed to final judgment that case is ended. Yes, it is ended, because it is adjudicated, or, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says to me, because it is an adjudicated thing. It is settled, and as to individual controversies, there must be an end, in the nature of things, to contention.

The doctrine of stare decisis—well known and enforced by the courts, a doctrine based upon the public interest and necessity—is different. The courts in some cases hold themselves bound by the doctrine of stare decisis, when, if the question were a new one, they would depart from the former decision. Why? Because it has become a rule of property and a basis for contracts. It has been so acted upon in the community, in the Commonwealth, or in the country that infinite harm would come to vast interests if the court should depart from it.

Not so as to that class of controversies or questions upon which rests no general property right. The courts often change their decision upon principles. The books are full of overruled cases. The list of overruled cases in this country would make a book as large as the Revised Statutes of the United States, if not larger. The highest courts of the States and the highest court of the United States have often overruled former decisions. So this doctrine of stare decisis is one limited in its scope. The supreme court of Texas—and to it I called the attention of the very few Senators who were then present, in the argument on the Corbett case—in drawing a distinction between the classes of cases, said:

> The proper determination of each of these cases depends upon the validity or invalidity of the "act to organize and maintain a system of public schools," approved April 24, 1872, and the authority conferred thereby to collect the taxes brought in question in them. The constitutionality of this law, and the liability of the taxpayers for these taxes has been sustained by this court. * * * It may be, therefore, thought that the question should not be regarded by us as now open for discussion—that whatever might be our views in respect to it, upon the principle of stare decisis we should hold it as definitely settled and concluded.
> We can not, however, regard the rule of stare decisis as having any just application to questions of the character involved in these cases. This doctrine grows out of the necessity for a uniform and settled rule of property and a definite basis for contracts and business transactions. If a decision is wrong, it is only when it has been so long the rule of action as that time and its continued application as the rule of right between parties demand sanction of its error; because, when a decision has been recognized as the law of property and conflicting demands have been adjusted and contracts have been made with reference to and on faith of it, greater injustice would be done to individuals and more injury result to society by a reversal of such decision, though erroneous, than to follow and observe it. But when a decision is not of this character, upon no sound principle do we feel at liberty to perpetuate an error into which either our predecessors or ourselves may have unadvisedly fallen merely upon the ground of such erroneous decision having been previously rendered.
> The questions to be considered in these cases have no application whatever to the title or transfer of property or to matters of contract. They involve the construction and interpretation of the organic law and present for consideration the structure of the Government, the limitations upon legislative and executive power as safeguards against tyranny and oppression. Certainly it can not be seriously insisted that questions of this character can be disposed of by the doctrine of stare decisis.

Mr. President, this is only a judicial body sub modo, even in the consideration of such questions as are here involved. It is not a court as the judicial tribunals are courts. When you go before a bench to argue a case the judges are there and they generally listen to your argument. That is rarely true in the Senate.

It was not true in the Corbett case. It is not true in this case. This is a political body. Every member of this body is a political leader in his State. It does not follow from that that we should not and that we will not decide these controversies in a conscientious way; but in passing upon them, in discussing them, in acting upon them, we are not acting in the calm atmosphere of a court from which ordinarily partisanship is excluded.

I remember reading a statement of Senator Butler, of South Carolina, an able man, referring to the decision of the Senate in the Tracy case, in which he said it was decided upon party lines. If Senators will take Taft's Election Cases and look at the large number of cases which arose during the war, they will find that in very many of them they were decided upon party lines. Each Senator here takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. If he is a man of honor—and every Senator is that, of course—he will keep that oath. He supports the Constitution as he believes it to be, not as some one else in this body believes it to be.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, right there, if the Senator will pardon me, will he tell us upon what theory or basis those will vote who are going to vote on this question differently from the way they voted on the Corbett case?

Mr. SPOONER. That is a question for the Senator to put to the Senators who are going to vote differently, if any are. I shall vote——

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that there are some.

Mr. DANIEL. Will not the same question apply to those changing from the way they voted in the Mantle case?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; or any case of a similar character.

Mr. SPOONER. Judges change their minds. I have not the highest possible opinion of a man who can not change his mind, and if a man changes his mind conscientiously, as he may, and therefore changes his vote, he is to be honored for it, not criticised for it. I have not changed my mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. What becomes of the Constitution under those conditions?

Mr. SPOONER. A Senator can change his mind about the Constitution just as courts have done.

But, Mr. President, what I mean to say is this: Each Senator enters into this obligation. It is a matter between him and his own honor and his own conscience. It is a matter for him to settle by the best light he can obtain for himself. If my view of the Constitution, formed after study, formed with perfect sincerity, leads me to believe a State is entitled to be represented here, when the question is later presented I can not change my oath or my sense of obligation because on some other occasion a majority of this body, lawyers and laymen, have taken a different view of their duty.

I do not undervalue precedent. Precedent, however, upon such a question should shackle no one here or elsewhere. If the precedent made by the Senate in the Corbett case is right, it should be adhered to—adhered to, Mr. President, not because it is precedent, but because it is right; and if the precedent made in the Corbett case is wrong, it should be abandoned because it is wrong.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question right upon the point of which he is now speaking.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think if in the Mantle case the decision had been his way, and in the Corbett case the decision had been his way, that from the beginning of this case in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and in the debate in the Senate we would have heard not much except the doctrine of stare decisis dinned into our ears by the Senator from Massachusetts, who is, so far as modern times go, the father of this doctrine that the Senate must always be full, and by everybody else who has followed him. It would have been difficult, would it not, I ask the Senator, for any of us who are opposed to him and his view now to have got our voices above surface for the reason that we should have been met at every turn and every moment by the declaration that twice the Senate had settled this great question on full debate. Does not the Senator believe that?

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely. I do not know how much the Senator from Massachusetts would have dinned into the Senator's ears. I know one thing: I should not have attempted to apply the doctrine of stare decisis. I should have urged, if the Senate had seated Mr. Corbett and the question were again before the Senate, that they should adhere to that view if they continued to think it the correct view, and I should have made as good an argument as I could that it was the correct view.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator comes to this result, that practically in cases of this sort in the Senate there is no such thing as the doctrine of stare decisis, but that each case as it comes up must be decided for the time being. Now, I ask the Senator, does he think that it is a good thing in the life of the Senate that a great question of this kind should be always repeatedly up before the Senate? Does he not think, as a matter of guidance to legislators and to governors, it is better that there should be an end, not, as lawyers say in the courts, of litigation, but of contention on a subject of this kind, and does the Senator think for a moment that if it should happen in this case that the contention which he is making for the minority of the committee should be settled by a bare majority that would settle it in the future?

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not want it settled in the future.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say that, did I?

Mr. HALE. Is not that the situation?

Mr. SPOONER. Must I vote with you against my convictions in order to settle it for the future?

Mr. HALE. But I am asking the Senator as a lawyer, and a good lawyer, as a legislator, and a very valuable legislator, and as a thoughtful man who is full of thought, whether he thinks it is not better that in this body some time or other this question should be settled, so that governors may know and legislatures may know what is the line of action to be pursued?

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine would consider it settled, I suppose, and eternally settled, so long as it is settled his way.

Mr. HALE. No, I do not think that; but it happens to be the fact that it has always been settled in my way.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose it had not been settled your way?

Mr. HALE. I should have given it up.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know.

Mr. HALE. I should have given it up.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would have to change his nature to give it up. The Senator would say that in all his votes he had been governed solely by a sense of his constitutional obligation, and unless he changed his mind, so long as the question was presented to the Senate, he would discharge his obligation as a Senator as he understood the Constitution to be.

Mr. HALE. Now the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I think I do the Senator that justice.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong there.

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw the compliment.

Mr. HALE. I will take the other side as the higher compliment, that on a great question of this kind, thoroughly discussed, I may say, for ages, with strong convictions one way or the other, particularly if I had participated in two consecutive struggles and the Senate had voted against me, I should say that is settled, because, Mr. President, it is the fact that in any discussion that has taken place heretofore, almost every Senator, with the exception of the Senator from Wisconsin, has made it a part and a feature of his argument in the case that this question ought to be settled; that it should not be continually coming up to pester us.

Mr. President, there are Senators in this body who are good lawyers, better lawyers than I am, as good lawyers as is the Senator from Wisconsin a good lawyer, whose action to-day will be based upon the fact that this matter has been fought out and settled by the Senate. They will vote upon that ground, and I shall be content to vote on that ground.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator asks me if I think this question ought constantly to be protruded in the Senate. I tell him, no. I regret that the question is here now, but it is here now. I shall be glad if the discussion of it shall lead either to legislation or to constitutional amendment which will prevent, as far as it is possible to do it, such questions hereafter as to the right of Senators to their seats.

I was not enamored of this doctrine of stare decisis or the value of precedent by the Corbett case and the manner in which it was disposed of. Arguments were used around this Chamber against Mr. Corbett, in debate and otherwise, based on personal charges, too, which never found their way into the committee room and as to which before the committee he was never for one moment challenged. How much weight they had with Senators I do not know; I do not care. That does not often happen in a court. There are many grounds for upholding the doctrine of stare decisis and the value of precedent in the courts which do not apply to the Senate.

But, Mr. President, I desire to proceed. This question is here. The Senator will vote upon it as he thinks is right. I will vote upon it as I think is right. If the Senator, having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, believed that the Constitution, properly construed, entitles the State of Pennsylvania to its representation here in the Senate, I very much doubt if he could persuade himself to vote against that representation simply because a majority in the Corbett case or in some other case had reached a different conclusion.

Now, Mr. President, some things about this are admitted. I admit, as I have always admitted, that it is only the legislature of the State which can "choose" a Senator or which can fill (using the word in the sense in which the Constitution uses it) a vacancy in the Senate. But in construing this constitutional provision, one of the greatest conceivable importance, one devised by the framers of the Constitution for a beneficent purpose, it, in my judgment, ought not to be read through a microscope.

Constitutions are not ordinarily construed in that way. You are not to look solely at the letter, ignoring utterly the purpose; you are not to look only at the body, ignoring utterly the spirit; nor are you permitted to look solely at the particular clause, ignoring other portions of the instrument in which the same language is used in almost the same connection; by that I mean in connection with vacancies in Federal offices. The whole instrument is to be read. The provisions in pari materia are to be considered, for where there is any question as to construction they throw light upon it.

The language is:

> If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments—
>
> Temporary appointments—
> until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Each State is given two Senators in this body. The Government was made by the States and for the States. Every star in the blue field upon our flag represents a State. We have added many to it; we have never permitted one to be taken from it.

This is the only body in the Government where the State as a State speaks.

One of the greatest contests in the Constitutional Convention was over the representation which should be given to the various States in the Senate. Some insisted upon proportionate representation; others upon a different basis; and out of the struggle (and this should never be forgotten in reading this clause) came the compromise which gave to the States equality in the Senate. Without this compromise, resulting in equality of the States, there would have been no Constitution. This is historically true. It was the purpose that in this Chamber the States then in the Union and thereafter to come into the Union should stand forever equal—not equal in area, not equal in population, not equal, Mr. President, in intelligence, not equal in wealth, nor in mountains and valleys and streams, but equal in the number of Senators, equal in votes, each Senator having one vote in this body.

In construing this language of the Constitution, not altogether apt, not altogether happily chosen, else this long-continued controversy over its construction would not have arisen, I have not found myself able to shut out the great light which comes from the Convention room as to the governing purpose of the Convention concerning the representation of States in this body.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he believes before the election of Senators of the first Senate the governor of any State had authority to appoint?

Mr. SPOONER. I think not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. Because of the classification provision of the Constitution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I will ask this question: Does not that classification clause of the Constitution indicate that the vacancies contemplated to be filled by governors were those resulting not from efflux of time, but by reason of the casualties mentioned in the Constitution?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I will get to that in a moment.

If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature, etc.

I have never been able to persuade myself that that word "happen" was there used——

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I lay no stress in this question upon the word "happen."

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator mentioned "casualty," and I supposed he was referring to the word "happen."

Mr. CULBERSON. The Constitution provides, if the Senator will permit me, that immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as nearly as may be into three classes. Then immediately after the classification and in the same clause of the Constitution it provides that if vacancies happen they shall be filled in a certain manner. Now, does it not follow that the filling of vacancies is provided for after the election to the full term by the original election body, to wit, the legislatures of the several States?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt whatever that that is not correct. I think after the first Senators have been elected and classified that it is not necessary, in order to give the governor jurisdiction to make a temporary appointment, that the vacancy must occur by some fortuitous event—death, expulsion, or something of that sort—after the term shall have been filled.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, others desire to speak, and I am anxious to conclude.

Mr. HALE. I had some thought of saying a few words myself.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to give the Senator an opportunity, if I can.

Mr. HALE. But in order that we may help the Senator out of his dilemmas I am willing to waive that entirely.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator kindly inform me of the dilemma which he proposes to help me out of?

Mr. HALE. I want the Senator to explain, if this doctrine that the Senate must be full and that the entire provision put into the Constitution by the fathers had for its life and spirit the one thing, that each State must always be represented here by two Senators, why that broad doctrine does not cover the question suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], that originally had there been any failure the governor must himself, of himself, and of his power secured what was the great desideratum, the two Senators in their place from each State. I do not see how the Senator has answered the question of the Senator from Texas. It seems to me that if his argument covers that it covers everything. The one thing, the sole thing, the fathers thought of was not of the machinery, not of classification, but that always there should be in the Senate two Senators from each State.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that the dilemma?

Mr. HALE. That is one dilemma.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator notify me as rapidly as he can of the various dilemmas that he thinks he can help me out of? I think it is very clear, Mr. President, and it has always been so considered, that this language applies only to vacancies which occur after Senators have been once chosen and classified. I never have heard anyone contend the contrary. "If vacancies happen by resignation." That implies that the office has been once filled, for a man could not very well resign or refuse to accept a seat in the Senate if he did not have it to resign. He could not be expelled if he were not a member. He could not accept an incompatible office so as to interfere with his tenure in the Senate unless he was in the Senate.

I have always assumed, and I think it has always been assumed by everyone, that original vacancies can only be filled by the legislature and that the power to make a temporary appointment would never arise until after an election and subsequent classification. The authority to make a classification is given only after an election. The Constitution clearly shows that in its provision for the classification of the first Senate:

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes.

It has never before been contended or suggested that the governor of a State just admitted into the Union could appoint the first Senators, or that appointed Senators could be classified, and no such construction follows from the contention which I am making.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me just one word there?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, yes.

Mr. STEWART. The State has no place until it is assigned to it. No vacancy can occur under the Constitution until the Senate assigns the places to the States. The State does not know what place it is going to have until it is assigned.

Mr. SPOONER. The legislature of a State must choose the first Senators. The governor can not choose Senators. When the legislature shall have chosen Senators, and they shall have been classified under the provisions of the Constitution, then the vacancies which occur after that may, within certain limitations, be temporarily filled by the appointment of the governor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me to go on, I wish to finish in order that others may speak. We are to vote at 4 o'clock, and I hoped that I might be permitted to proceed without interruption, for I desire to be brief. However, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the Senator whether there is no difference in his mind between vacancies that occur after a seat has once been filled—that is, vacancies that would happen—and vacancies that occur by reason of the limitation of the term?

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. This case is one in which it was known far ahead, when Mr. Quay was first elected, that his term would end on the 4th of March of last year. It did not happen. There is no casualty about it; there is no accident.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any casualty about a resignation?

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any accident about a resignation?

Mr. TILLMAN. There is this about it, that the framers of the Constitution could not provide for all these things.

Mr. SPOONER. They did provide for vacancy caused by resignation, however. But is there any accident or casualty about a resignation?

Mr. TILLMAN. It was not in contemplation when a man was elected, for "few die and none resign."

Mr. SPOONER. But the contention is, upon the word "happen" and, that the use of the word "happen" makes it plain that the framers of the Constitution only intended that a vacancy should be filled by a temporary appointment when the vacancy had occurred through some fortuitous event.

Mr. TILLMAN. In this case——

Mr. SPOONER. Is a resignation a fortuitous thing? It is purely voluntary. As I had the honor to say in the Corbett case, if it were otherwise than voluntary, it would be invalid. But I will answer his question, if the Senator will permit me, as I go along. I have never been able to persuade myself that the framers of the Constitution used the word "happen" in any other than a generic sense, or used it as indicating that the only vacancies which could be filled by gubernatorial appointments were vacancies which were accidental, the result of casualty or fortuitousness. Why did they provide for temporary appointments at all?

In some of the States, as appears from the proceedings of the Convention, the legislatures met oftener than once a year. The governors had the power to call them in extraordinary session. Why did they provide for this temporary appointment at all? They did not provide that the governor might fill a vacancy in the House of Representatives temporarily. They provided that as to the Senate the governor might fill a vacancy temporarily. Why? Because they deemed it of such vital consequence that the States should remain equal in votes in this body. No other consideration imaginable could have influenced them.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], who made, as he always makes, an able argument, called attention to the fact that this provision is an anomalous and unique one. I agree to that. He called attention to the distinction made by the Constitution between the coordinate branches of the Government, and to the fact that it is not an executive function to choose or appoint a legislator. I agree to that. It is unique; it is not in harmony with our general system; but it is in the Constitution. Why was it put there?

Why did the framers of the Constitution invest the governor of a State with this extraordinary power of appointing a Senator of the United States temporarily? Only because, Mr. President, of their great anxiety that there should be no "inconvenient chasm" in the State representation in the Senate; only because of their anxiety that the compromise which gave to each State two Senators should to the fullest possible extent be carried forward and safeguarded. The Senator from Kentucky finds in that strange provision, or rather in its uniqueness, an argument against our contention. I find in it an argument for it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I ask the Senator if I may interrupt him for just one question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether he can not find some other reason than the one which he assigns for giving to the executive of a State the appointment of a Senator under the circumstances? I can find one, and it is this: It was, as the Senator himself eloquently has said, the intention of the makers of the Constitution that the House of Representatives should be chosen by the people and that the choosing of a Representative should always remain with the people. Therefore the governor was not allowed to appoint a member of the House of Representatives: but, on the other hand, it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the legislatures, and not the people, should elect a Senator. Therefore it was their intention that it should not go to the people under any circumstances. What other power was there that could fill a vacancy, if it was to be filled, except the governor of the State?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator gives a reason why the Constitution does not provide for an appointment by the governor to fill a vacancy in the representation from a State in the other House. He does not controvert the statement of the Senator from Kentucky, nor does he controvert at all the argument which I was making, and that is this: That the very fact that the framers of the Constitution industriously gave this power to the governor is conclusive evidence that they did not intend, except in the rare cases where it was absolutely unavoidable, that the States should be without full representation in the Senate. Otherwise they certainly would have made no provision for temporary appointments at all. They had fought for equality of States in the Senate, and they intended to secure it to the utmost practicable extent.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not spend time to make the philological argument upon this word "happen" or upon the language of the succeeding clause. I made it once, and I do not care to repeat it.

Mr. President, from an early day to this, although it has been often debated, the meaning of this word "happen" and the question whether the governor in exercising his power of appointment is limited to vacancies occurring after the term has once been filled, and it has been decided thirteen times that that is not the proper construction of the Constitution. How could it be otherwise? To impute a contrary purpose to the framers of the Constitution would be to impeach their intelligence, and would be to say that they forgot the great purpose of the struggle to give the States equality in this body.

Could it be ever imputed to them that it was their intention, carefully providing here as far as might be for continued equality in the Senate, that if a man was elected to the Senate by a legislature and refused to accept, there should be a vacancy until another legislature met and elected? Was it their intention to leave this provision of the Constitution in such plight that if a man was elected to the United States Senate by a legislature and died on his way to the Capitol to take his oath a vacancy must continue? Not at all. And so, Mr. President, I say without hesitation that it is, not only upon reason, but upon precedents rightly made, settled that the governor, notwithstanding the use of this word "happen," has the power to fill a vacancy temporarily, even if the term has not been once filled.

I never yet have been able to become reconciled, Mr. President, to the doctrine of the Corbett case. Precedents, it is true, may be invoked for it. The debates upon the early precedents are scant. Upon those of later years they are more elaborate. I have considered the Smith case, of Maryland, and the Sevier case, of Arkansas, as necessarily overruling the earlier precedents. If the governor may make a temporary appointment to fill a vacancy at the beginning of a term because of the death of a Senator elected by the legislature, or his refusal to accept, as seems to be well settled, it is difficult to see why one may not be so temporarily appointed where the legislature failed, for one reason or another, to choose.

I doubt if the framers of the Constitution contemplated the failure of legislatures to choose, but it has seemed to me clear that they did not intend that the power of temporary appointment should be restricted to defeat the purpose for which it was inserted in the Constitution. Such appointment, it must be constantly borne in mind, does not fill the vacancy, but provides a Senator temporarily to exercise the functions and subserve in the interim the interests of the State and of the country. The necessity for a temporary appointment would be as great in one case as in another. They made it, so far as language could do so, compulsory upon the succeeding legislature to then fill such vacancy, and doubtless did not contemplate a failure in the performance of such duty.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will excuse me, I will interject another idea and then let him elaborate that, and will not interrupt him any more. In this case which we are discussing the question as to the recess of the legislature enters in very largely.

Mr. SPOONER. I will come to that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. I shall not interrupt the Senator further, if he will touch on that point.

Mr. SPOONER. I will touch on it, and I will touch on it rapidly, and finish if I may.

Mr. President, in the Corbett case, when the 3d day of March came, there was a vacancy in the Senate, caused by the expiration of the term of Senator Mitchell, and the legislature of Oregon was not in session. It was in "a recess of the legislature;" and by the plain language of the Constitution, as I read it without construction, the governor had the power to appoint:

> If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments.

And in the case of Corbett, when the vacancy happened, it was during the recess of the legislature. Why did not the governor have the power to appoint? Because, Senators say, the legislature had been in session, it had had an opportunity to choose a Senator, and it had failed to do so. Where do you find that in the Constitution? It may be true or it may be false that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated the failure of a legislature to choose a Senator to fill a vacancy; but they use in that respect elastic language, and the jurisdiction, so far as the governor was concerned, given by the Constitution, construed most strictly, depends on two facts—one, that a vacancy has happened, or occurred, or come to pass, or exists; the other, that it was in a recess of the legislature. These two jurisdictional facts existed, in my view, in the Corbett case.

I have often put the question: Suppose the legislature met and before they could elect a Senator was dispersed by an armed mob or driven away by some epidemic—cholera, yellow fever, or the like—would the governor have no power to make this temporary appointment if, when the Senate met, or if, when the vacancy occurred, there was a recess of the legislature? If not, why not? It would be no fault of the State. The people would have done all they could do; the legislature would have done all it could do; but if, prevented by overweening force, it had failed to choose a Senator, was it the purpose of the framers of the Constitution, having struggled so hard for a compromise which would leave the States equally represented here, that in a case such as that the governor should have no power even to make a temporary appointment?

Senators have answered me that in that case, possibly he might appoint, because the State would not be at fault; it would have tried to elect a Senator. My reply to that has been, and it is my reply to-day to it, Where do you find in the Constitution, the jurisdictional facts existing, the power to discipline and punish a State?

Mr. TURLEY. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will not. There are Senators who want to speak, and I have no right to yield.

Mr. TURLEY. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. It may happen, as I suggested in the Corbett case, that a legislature is unable to elect and the reason for its failure is a creditable one. There may be differences of conviction in matters of great national policies, a contest between parties nearly equally divided, or a little band of men, honest men, of both political parties, may combine to defeat the election of a Senator by bribery and fraud, thereby not only protecting the people of the State, but protecting the people of the United States and protecting the honor of the Senate. Is the State in such a case as that, the vacancy occurring during the recess of the legislature, to be deprived of representation?

I say again what I said before, that when you go beyond the spirit of this instrument in this respect and when you accord to a State or deny it equal representation in the Senate according to your judgment as to whether the State is or is not at fault, you tread upon dangerous ground. If there has been a case where a State was at fault and where a people could be said to be at fault, I think it was the State of New Hampshire, which year after year allowed its constitutional provision to remain, regulating the meetings of its legislature so that it could not elect seasonably in accordance with the act of Congress. That was a trouble which the people of that State could easily have remedied and which they did remedy after a while.

But meanwhile in the Bell case and in the Blair case Senators were admitted under appointment of the governor at the beginning of the term.

The whole point is this: It is only a temporary appointment; it only lasts until the next meeting of the legislature, which is commanded by the Constitution to then fill the vacancy; and I think when they inserted that provision in the Constitution they inserted it with a purpose to safeguard the interests and equality of the States here, and I am not prepared to believe that they expected it to be refined and whittled all to pieces until finally it was substantially eliminated from the Constitution.

Has the time come when Senators find authority to change the constitutional provision so as to make it read?—

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies, provided the legislature shall have met and failed to elect.

This proviso is not in the Constitution.

You add that proviso to that clause. Where do you find the authority to do it? Senators who criticise us for reading the word "happen" as "happen to exist" or "happen to be" as importing something into the Constitution which is not there, in order to disfranchise a State themselves add a proviso at the end of that clause, "if the legislature shall have met and failed to elect."

But, Mr. President, I must hasten. Great liberties have been taken with this clause of the Constitution. You ask the Senate to construe it literally. The Senate never has construed it literally. The Senate has sacrificed, and sacrifices now, the letter of this clause of the Constitution. Why? For the same purpose precisely which led the framers of that instrument to give the power of temporary appointment that the Senate may be full as nearly as possible and the States may be equal here. How? This says:

> The executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Mr. TILLMAN. Suppose the governor does not do it?

Mr. SPOONER. That is not the point. The governor may appoint "until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." What does that word "meeting" mean? What does the word "until" mean? The word "meeting" is a plain word. It means to come together. It is defined by the Standard Dictionary "a coming together; an assembling." Webster defines it "a coming together; an assembly." It is not a word of technical signification.

The word "until" is familiar to every one who at all understands the language. It is simple and plain. The Standard Dictionary defines it, "to the time when; up to; till." Webster defines it, "to; till; as far as; to the point that; especially, up to the time that." He says the word is rarely employed in modern usage, except as to time. No one can doubt that it is used in this clause of the Constitution solely with reference to time.

And what is the plain meaning, then, of the phrase "until the next meeting of the legislature?" It manifestly means that it limits the term of the appointee of the governor until the meeting (which probably includes organization) of the legislature. Of course, if literally construed, there would be a vacancy in the Senatorial office from the time the legislature meets until it chooses a Senator; and to guard against this, from an early day, in violation of the language, the Senate of the United States resorted to a fiction of law, and held that the meeting of the legislature was an entirety, lasting as it were but a day, and that the Senator was entitled to hold under the gubernatorial appointment until his successor was elected or the legislature adjourned without an election.

Is this obeying the letter of the Constitution? No. But it is yielding, Mr. President, to the spirit of the Constitution, and has been done in order to prevent by construction as far as possible a break in the representation of a State in this body.

One thing more, Mr. President, and I shall have finished. There is another clause in the Constitution almost identical with that under consideration. The third subdivision of section 2, Article II, of the Constitution provides that—

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may "happen" during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

I never have known exactly what significance, if any, is to be attached to the word "up," used in this connection. If one fills a glass, I suppose he fills it up. If he fills it up, he does no more than fill it. If the Executive fills a vacancy, he fills it, and that is the end of it. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] seemed to put great emphasis upon the word "up." The meaning of the sentence would be precisely the same, I think, if the word were omitted.

Here in this clause of the Constitution we have the word "happen" again used in connection with a vacancy. It has never been construed to be limited at all to vacancies occasioned by casualty or anything in the nature of fortuitousness. It has from the beginning applied as much to vacancies caused by expiration of term as to vacancies caused by death, resignation, or otherwise, and of course no distinction could be made, because, however the vacancy is caused, it must, in the public interest, be filled.

The word "happen" is used also in connection with vacancy in subdivision 4 of section 2 of Article I of the Constitution, thus:

> When vacancies "happen" in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Placing the narrow construction upon the word "happen" which is contended for here, in connection with a vacancy in the representation in Congress, Mr. President, the governor would only have power to issue his writ for a special election, where by some fortuitous event the office of Representative became vacant, the term having once been filled. This would be nonsense. The clause applies as fully, and it has always been so held since the Constitution was adopted, to a vacancy caused by a failure of the people to elect, or by the death of a Representative elected but not sworn in, as to any other case.

But passing from the word "happen," I beg the attention of the Senate to the words "during a recess of the Senate." Note the similarity between the language employed in this clause and that employed in the clause under consideration here. The one clause says:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, etc.

The other says:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

Will some Senator tell me upon what principle of constitutional construction these words, almost identical, used in each clause with relation to substantially the same subject, are to be given one construction where used in one clause and an entirely different construction where used in the other?

It became necessary early in the history of the Government to construe this language:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate—

And it was found that if it were construed strictly, as Senators here desire it shall be construed, it would dismantle the ship; it would leave a vast number of administrative offices, which became vacant during a session of the Senate instead of during a recess of the Senate, unfilled, the laws to go unadministered, and so it was construed in a manner which would permit the spirit of the Constitution to control, and the purpose for which it was adopted to be subserved.

Attorney-General Wirt, discussing this clause (1 Opinions Attorneys-General, 631), says:

> The doubt arises from the circumstance of its having first occurred during the session of the Senate. But the expression used by the Constitution is "happen"—"all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." The most natural sense of this term is "to chance; to fall out; to take place by accident." But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean "happen to take place"—that is, "to originate," under which sense the President would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean also, without violence to the sense, "happen to exist," under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me the most accordant with the letter of the Constitution, the second the most accordant with its reason and spirit.
> This seems to me the only construction of the Constitution which is compatible with the spirit, reason, and purpose, while at the same time it offers no violence to its language. And these I think are the governing points to which all sound construction looks. The opposite construction is perhaps more strictly consonant with the mere letter, but it overlooks the spirit, reason, and purpose, and, like all constructions merely literal, its tendency is to defeat the substantial meaning of the instrument and to produce the most embarrassing inconveniences.

Further he says:

> In reason it seems to me perfectly immaterial when the vacancy first arose, for whether it arose during the session of the Senate or during their recess, it equally requires to be filled. The Constitution does not look to the moment of the origin of the vacancy, but to the state of things at the point of time at which the President is called on to act. Is the Senate in session? Then he must make a nomination to that body. Is it in recess? Then the President must fill the vacancy by a temporary commission.

Mr. Taney, Attorney-General under President Jackson, in an opinion dated July 19, 1832 (2 Opinions Attorneys-General, 525), concurring in the construction placed upon this clause by Mr. Wirt, says:

It was intended to provide for those vacancies which might arise from accident and the contingencies to which human affairs must always be liable. And if it falls out that from death, inadvertence, or mistake an office required by law to be filled is in recess found to be vacant, then a vacancy has happened during the recess, and the President may fill it. This appears to be the common sense and the natural import of the words used. They mean the same thing as if the Constitution had said, "if there happen to be any vacancies during the recess."

This view was concurred in by Mr. Legaré, October 22, 1841 (3 Opinions, 673); Mr. Mason, August 10, 1846 (4 Opinions, 523); Mr. Caleb Cushing, May 25, 1855 (7 Opinions, 186); Mr. Edward Bates, October 15, 1862 (10 Opinions, 356); Mr. James Speed, March 25, 1865 (11 Opinions, 179); Mr. Henry Stanbery, August 30, 1866 (12 Opinions, 32); Mr. William M. Evarts, August 17, 1868 (12 Opinions, 449); and Mr. Charles Devens (14 Opinions, 538).

I can not take the time to give the reasoning of these opinions. Of course it will be remembered that the appointment by the President consists of three steps. The nomination is one, the confirmation another, the commission is the third. Strictly, perhaps, the commission is only evidence of the nomination and confirmation. This construction is one of necessity. Otherwise if a vacancy came about during a session of the Senate and the President did not send in a nominee, or when the Senate had no time to confirm, or where an officer died in a distant land and notice of death did not seasonably arrive, and other cases, the President would have no power after adjournment of the Senate and during the remainder of the year to fill the office at all.

Mr. Justice Woods, of the Supreme Court of the United States, sitting at the circuit, approved this construction of the Constitution in the case of In re Farrow and Bigby (4 Woods Reports, page 491). After referring to the opinions of the distinguished jurists who had filled the office of Attorney-General, he says:

These opinions exhaust all that can be said on the subject. They were rendered upon the call of the executive department, and under the obligation of the oath of office, and are entitled to the highest consideration.

In his opinion Mr. Bates says that the power to fill vacancies which occur during the recess has been sanctioned, so far as he knows and believes, by the unbroken acquiescence of the Senate; it is true that individual members of the Senate have disputed the power, but not the Senate itself.

Congress has recognized the power by section 2 of the act of February 9, 1863 (Revised Statutes, section 1761), which declares, "No money shall be paid from the Treasury as salary to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session, and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate."

The only authority relied on to support the other view is the case decided by the late Judge Cadwalader, the learned and able United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

It is no disparagement to Judge Cadwalader to say that his opinion, unsupported by any other, ought not to be held to outweigh the authority of the great names which are cited in support of the opposite view, and of the practice of the executive department for nearly sixty years, the acquiescence of the Senate therein, and the recognition of the power claimed by both Houses of Congress.

I therefore shall hold that the President had constitutional power to make the appointment of Bigby, notwithstanding the fact that the vacancy filled by his appointment first happened when the Senate was in session.

This is a list of distinguished lawyers, men acting under oath, Mr. President; men not sitting, as we are sitting, in a body quasi political; men in honor bound to advise the President as to his constitutional power. Without break from the days of Wirt down to to-day they have construed this same language as to the power to fill vacancies during a recess of the Senate and the word "happen" to mean "happen to be" or "happen to exist." It mattered not, according to their opinion, whether the vacancy occurred by expiration of a term of office or by some casualty or fortuitous event.

Mr. President, that, by early, long-continued, uniform practice of eighty years, is the settled construction of that language in the Constitution. The courts adhere to it upon that theory. The courts will continue to adhere to it upon that theory.

I believe, Mr. President, that the Presidents and their Attorneys-General have construed the language correctly. I believe the clause relative to the power of the governor to make temporary appointment of Senators, containing, as it does, substantially the same language, should receive the same construction. It is almost inconceivable that this language should mean one thing to the Presidents and their law officers and another thing in the Senate in its relation to the power of the governor to make temporary appointments of Senators. It was a necessary construction in the one case in order to prevent lapses in administration which would be intolerable to the people. It is quite as important in the other in order to secure the equality of the States intended by the Constitution, and to keep the body of lawmakers full, as nearly as practicable.

Mr. President, in my short and not very eventful life, in the practice of my profession I have had occasion many times to exercise in statutory and constitutional construction such ingenuity as I possess. Standing here in the Senate of the United States I can have no purpose except to carry out the object of the framers of the Constitution to keep the States—the greatest of all constituencies—equal in this body, as they were intended to be.

I would be ingenious if I could and it were necessary, in order to open the door, but not to shut and bar it to temporary appointments. If in the lapse of years, as sometimes seems, by the increase of partisanship in the States the spirit of patriotism has been somewhat impaired, if with the vast increase of wealth and "bossism" this power is abused by successful attempts upon the part of powerful and ambitious leaders to defeat elections by the people, that affords no reason why we should shave this constitutional provision into nothing, why we should take the narrowest conceivable view of it to exclude a State from equality here even though it be but temporary, while it may and it does afford good reason for changing the organic law or for enacting legislation which will tend to defeat such combinations in the States.

Mr. President, I have not been able myself to see that the provision of the constitution of Pennsylvania has bearing upon what we should do in the exercise of constitutional duty in this case.

I listened with great pleasure to the speech of my colleague upon this phase of the question yesterday. I have not had opportunity to read the speech. I am unable to agree with my colleague's view, but I can not withhold expression of my admiration for the ability, ingenuity, and eloquence with which he presented it, and I congratulate him and the great State which he so well represents here upon his auspicious entry into the debate of this forum. His speech was an honor to himself and to Wisconsin.

But, Mr. President, I do not perceive that the amendment to the constitution of Pennsylvania has in any wise, or could in any wise, deprive the governor of that State of the power of appointment, if without that provision he would possess the power, which I think he does. It is very true that by the Constitution of the United States the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators is primarily left to the States. They adopted various methods in various States. But Congress, in the exercise of the power to alter the regulations as to times and manner, passed the act of 1866.

Under that act, which I think is a full exercise of the reserve power—at any rate, as much as we have ever known, for it has never been admitted that Congress could fix the time when the legislature should meet—Congress has provided what legislature shall elect or choose a Senator. It is the legislature "chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected." Congress has provided at just what time after the legislature meets it shall proceed to choose a Senator; that covers the "time of holding election;" and Congress has prescribed the precise manner in which the election shall take place, first by separate votes in the two houses, afterwards by meeting in convention to verify, where the vote in each house has produced an election, or a vote in convention where the houses have not been able separately to elect. I think that covers the whole ground.

If the governor of Pennsylvania had, under the constitutional provision, called together the legislature, then, in their proceeding, they would have been bound as to the time in the session of electing a Senator and the manner of such election, by the provisions of the act of 1866; but I do not think it has been left to a State by any regulation of its own to deprive the governor of a power which he derives from the Constitution of the United States to make temporary appointment of a Senator.

Mr. President, I have not attempted to go through the precedents or to make any complete argument upon the subject. I have finished, and I regret very much that I have, by reason of interruptions, spoken longer than I intended. If I know myself there is no tie or influence which would lead me to vote to admit a man here whom I thought not entitled under the Constitution to come, nor is there any enmity, personal unpopularity, or popular prejudice which would induce me to vote to exclude a man from this Chamber who came here with credentials which I felt, under the Constitution of the United States, bound to accept. Pennsylvania, in my judgment, sends Mr. Quay here with such credentials, and I therefore shall cast my vote to admit him to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I would not occupy the time of the Senate for one moment in this case if the Corbett case had not been used as an argument in favor of excluding Mr. Quay from a seat in this body. I voted against seating Mr. Corbett upon an entirely different ground from any construction of this constitutional provision. If there had been no other reason but a construction of the Constitution, I should certainly have voted for Mr. Corbett. I may have been mistaken in the facts which influenced my vote; we frequently are; but we must vote conscientiously upon the facts that we possess and which we believe to be true.

I believed at the time, whether it was true or false, that Mr. Corbett, a very rich man, was in a conspiracy with the governor and others to prevent the organization of the legislature to secure the Senatorship for himself or his friends, and that the Senatorship was the prize which induced the defeat of that organization. I did not think that Mr. Corbett came with clean hands entitled to a seat under those circumstances.

I have no doubt whatever of the right and duty of the governor to appoint in a case like this. The question has always been very simple to me. I believe it was rightly construed for the first twenty-five years—yes, the first thirty years—till 1825. The phrase is:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Now, there are two very natural meanings to the word "happen." The first is to originate; to begin. That probably, if there were nothing else to govern it, would be the most plausible construction. It might be so construed in the general acceptation. But there is another way which comports with the object of it better. Undoubtedly the meaning that the framers of the Constitution had in mind is this: Happen to exist, or happen to be. That construction was given until 1825 without dissenting voice, and the same construction has been given from the foundation of the Government until now by the law officers of the Government, by all the Departments of the Government, to the same kind of language, which is as follows:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

They said it would be an inconvenience if the Executive did not have the power to fill offices. It would be a great inconvenience, but nothing like so great as if the executive had not power to fill these places in the Senate, because the duties of those offices could generally be exercised by deputies, etc. There is hardly a case where there is no provision for some one else to discharge the duties. It is nothing like so urgent as in the case of Senators, because nobody can perform the duties. They can not be performed by a deputy.

All the law officers of the Government from its foundation down and every President have construed "happen" in that connect on to mean "happen to be" or "happen to exist." There is no doubt concerning the language. Over a hundred years of constant construction of the word "happen," and for the first thirty or forty years it applied to Senators, it always seemed to me made the question very plain. I never had the slightest doubt that it was the duty of the governor to appoint in a case like this and that the Senate should receive the appointee. The object of the amendment at all providing for the filling of vacancies was to keep the Senate full. There can be no doubt of that. Why is it not just as important that it should be kept full when the vacancy happens before a recess? It exists during the vacation of the legislature, when it can not act. The same reason for representation exists in the one case as in the other. Why not give it the common-sense construction that it had at that time and which has been given to the same language in order to carry on the Government? Why give it a strained construction to deprive the State of its representation in the Senate? It ought not to be done, and I hope it will not be done in this case. It would be an exceedingly bad example.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, my convictions concerning the true interpretation of the Constitution will compel me, on the case made here, to vote against the seating of Mr. Quay. I do not rise for the purpose of making an argument to sustain the views which I hold. The case has already been argued so fully and with so much learning and ability on both sides that I could not hope to add anything of value to what has already been said, especially at this late hour and in the limited time permitted to me.

My purpose in taking the floor is simply to explain my vote in order that I may avoid possible misconstruction which might lead to undeserved criticism.

The impression prevails among the press and the public generally that this case is similar in every respect to the case of Mr. Corbett, decided by this body during the last Congress, and that all those Senators who then voted to seat Mr. Corbett must now, in order to be consistent, vote to seat Mr. Quay. This impression is a very erroneous one. The two cases are different in most essential particulars.

In the present case the legislature of Pennsylvania was in session balloting to elect a successor to Mr. Quay at the moment the vacancy occurred to fill which he holds the appointment of the governor, and it remained in session striving to elect a successor to him for several weeks thereafter.

In the Corbett case the legislature which ought to have elected a successor to Mr. Mitchell, the then sitting Senator for the State of Oregon, had never organized and did not, therefore, have an opportunity to ballot for Mr. Mitchell's successor. Moreover, if it had organized and balloted, its session would have expired by limitation, under the constitution of Oregon, before the expiration of Mr. Mitchell's term and therefore before the happening of the vacancy which Mr. Corbett was appointed to fill.

My view of the Constitution as applied to that case was that the governor was empowered to appoint to fill a vacancy happening from any cause—efflux of time or otherwise—during a recess of the legislature, and that he was still empowered to appoint where the vacancy happened from efflux of time, even where the legislature had balloted to fill the term, or might have so balloted if it had been organized, provided that the balloting or the opportunity to ballot was before the happening of the vacancy, and that the vacancy actually happened during a recess. Holding these views, I was compelled, of course, to vote in favor of seating Mr. Corbett. But I then held and expressed the other view—that vacancies happening while a legislature was in session, or happening before a legislative session and remaining unfilled until it met, could not be filled by the appointment of the governor. This view will compel me to vote against the seating of Mr. Quay.

I wish to read briefly from some remarks made by me on the Corbett case, for the purpose of indicating the position I then took concerning the constitutional power of the governors of the States in this class of cases. My remarks will be found on pages 2177 and 2178 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Fifty-fifth Congress, volume 31, part 3:

> Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true that the Federal Convention had in mind two methods of keeping the representation in the Senate filled, and that one of them may be properly termed primary and the other contingent. It expected that ordinarily legislatures would perform their constitutional duty and make elections at appropriate times, so that vacancies to occur at stated and known periods would be filled up in that manner.
> This undoubtedly was the primary manner by which it was expected Senators would be accredited to this body. The contingent method was to be by appointment at the hands of the executives of the States, and was to be exercised by them only when the legislatures could not act and only until such times as the legislatures had had full opportunity to act. Nobody disputes this. But in one view of the question, I think, the effect to be attributed to this distinction is exaggerated and in the other I think it is lost sight of.
> In my judgment, there is virtue in a middle course. Medio tutissimus ibis. When a vacancy happens under circumstances which bring it fairly within the language of the Constitution authorizing the governor to appoint, I would not defeat the exercise of that power on any strict construction of the Constitution. On the other hand, when it happens under circumstances not fairly within the language of the Constitution, I would not do violence to language in deference to some supposed overruling constitutional intent in order to effectuate that intent. It is not sufficient that a particular intent be found in a statute or constitution to justify a construction which will effectuate it. There must be apt words evidencing that intent upon which the construction can rest.
> Now, it seems evident to my mind that those who claim to have discovered a purpose on the part of the Federal Convention to exclude the power of appointment from the executive in vacancies caused by the efflux of time must draw largely on inferences which, while they may find satisfactory countenance in the language of the Constitution construed in one sense, are yet opposed to the language of that instrument in another and almost equally permissible sense, and which are wholly opposed to the history of the convention in its dealings with the subject.
> On the other hand, those who would throw the bars down entirely and say that vacancies existing at any time and under all circumstances may be filled by the executives of the States, and as often and as long as said vacancies happen to exist, not only have no warrant for such a position, except a supposed overruling intent, but their position is opposed to the express language of the Constitution and to a long line of precedents in this body which are absolutely unbroken and without contradiction.

I summed up my conclusions as follows:

> First. They may appoint when a vacancy shall happen from any cause during a recess of the legislature.
> Second. They may not appoint where the vacancy happens during a session of the legislature, or where, having happened before, it continues until after the legislature has adjourned.
> Third. It follows as a corollary from the first proposition that the fact that a legislature makes an ineffectual effort to elect before the vacancy actually happens does not cut off the right of appointment by the executive.

Mr. President, I have not been shaken in these views by the debates to which I have listened in this case. I believed them to be sound when I uttered them, and I still believe them to be sound. And so believing, they will, of course, control my vote, although I might wish, on personal grounds, that it were possible to vote otherwise. But I do not conceive that personal considerations ought to have any weight, or that they do have any weight, with Senators in deciding grave constitutional questions of this character. Neither personal nor political considerations have any weight with me in this class of cases, and they never will have so long as I am honored with a seat in this Chamber.

Mr. DANIEL. Time presses, Mr. President, and I must be brief. I can not make a speech as I intended to do; I can only seek to impress a point upon the attention of the Senate. This is a judicial case and ought to be decided upon judicial principles. Upon my oath as a Senator of the United States, delivering true judgment according to my legal conviction, I do declare that I believe Matthew S. Quay is entitled to a seat in this body, and so believing, I shall so vote.

I have not time, Mr. President, to undertake any review of the authorities in this case. No review of them so far reflected in the Senate decisions would be satisfactory to analysis. In the space of one hundred and ten years in which questions like that before us have been debated its opinions have been as diversified, as antagonistic, and as reversible as the opinions of some of our friends on the Porto Rican tariff.

I accept a point of view which was stated yesterday in a very able and interesting speech of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. I have looked for his speech in the RECORD, that I might quote him accurately. Not finding it there, I must rely upon memory. In effect he said that each Senator should state the precise view upon which he bases his opinion. I base my opinion that Mr. Quay is entitled to a seat in this body upon the true intent and meaning of the Constitution as expressed in its language, accepting the meaning of that language as it has been construed in the Federal Government of the United States from the Administration of John Adams to this day.

The Senator from Wisconsin thinks that we ought to take this language all off by itself, hang it in the air, and construe it as if it stood alone. If it were so construed, the word "happen," which is elastic, flexible, and applicable in numerous ways, would not be contorted or twisted away from the fair and just significance which 12 Attorney-Generals of the United States have given it, if I gave the meaning to it which I do here.

But I shall not overlook, Mr. President, the wise injunction of John Marshall to those who would put a narrow, rigid construction upon the Constitution when he declared that they should not forget it was a Constitution they were construing. I would say to my learned friend, in reply to his very ingenious and able suggestions, that if we desire to do so, we can not forget that this is a Constitution we are construing, nor ought we to forget that all the Presidents of the United States, from John Adams to William McKinley, have construed these identical words which we are called upon to construe not in the narrow, technical, and alienated way that opposition Senators would suggest, but according to the fair and just meaning of the phraseology in its connection in the text of a living Constitution.

The question is, Mr. President, whether the word "happen" in the Constitution means "happen to begin" or "happen to be." The question is whether the moment of the happening of the vacancy was the predominant thing or the purview of the Constitution makers, or whether it was the vacancy so created that they had their eyes upon and which they desired to fill.

If we look at the debates in the Constitutional Convention we find it declared by one of the framers, Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, that the clause as to the temporary filling of vacancies by the governors of States was put in the Constitution to prevent "inconvenient chasms in the Senate." If there had been no declaration upon the subject it is the obvious and self-evident fact that such was the case, for no other purpose but to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate could have put it there.

The junior Senator from Wisconsin tells us that we ought not to construe the matter at all, it is so plain to mean what he thinks it means; and yet, Mr. President, when he delivered his eulogy upon our Constitution makers and their aptness in the use of language, he presently discerned that that plain meaning which he had put upon the terms of the Constitution produced a chasm in the Constitution—a casus omissus, as the lawyers term it—and that unless the governor can fill the vacancy after a legislature has failed to do so there is no power that could fill it.

And so to-day, Mr. President, when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] came to construe this clause in the Constitution, he came to the conclusion that our Constitution makers were not as wise as the Senator from Wisconsin thought for, and that they had indeed left a cave in the Constitution with no power on earth extant and ready that can fill it.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States ought not to be construed by eyes astute to pull it to pieces. It was made for living beings in a world of work and trouble and care. The old common law told us, borrowing the doctrine from the civilians, that all written documents should be construed that their purpose might live and not perish.

And, sir, I am following the very fundamental spirit of the common law when I say that I shall construe the Constitution of the United States that the Government may live, that the State may live, that the Senate may live in perfect shape and not in mutilation.

Mr. President, if their construction of the word "vacancy" and of the word "happen" be true, the Congress of the United States is wrong in its daily legislation, and I beg to say to the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that he should look to the appropriation bill to apply the doctrines that he wants to apply to an election to the Senate.

Mr. President, here are the identical words, whose meaning we are invited to interpret, in the language as to Presidential appointments:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

Now, apply the construction which these gentlemen invoke to that sentence, and where are we? The President could fill no vacancy beginning when the Senate was in recess, because "happen" means, as is contended, the moment the vacancy begins. He must enter into a scholastic discussion of the word "happen;" he must take his eyes entirely away from the yawning vacancy which the Constitution intended him to fill. The Presidents of the United States from John Adams down have looked at these words in the exactly opposite way. John Adams appointed Amos Binney naval agent in the city of Boston, although the vacancy did not begin in the recess of the Senate, but he thought it happened during the recess of the Senate, if it existed in the recess—for there it was for him to fill, and he filled it.

Mr. President, in the old days of the Democratic Presidents—Monroe, Jackson, Tyler, Polk, and Pierce—no question could have been made and no such "nice, sharp quillet of the law" could have destroyed the common sense of construction and put an impediment under the wheels of Government as is here suggested.

Attorney-General Wirt led off in an opinion to the contrary. He was a scholar. He wrestled with the giants of the bar. Before the Supreme Court he was a foeman worthy of any man's steel. He said that the word "happen" there meant "happen to exist." He did not put the word "exist" in the Constitution. He said the word "exist" was wrapped up in the meaning of the word "happen."

Mr. President, the idea of happening on the part of these narrow and rigid constructionists is that a happening must be of something that begins and ends instantaneously, like a pistol shot.

But, Mr. President, there are happenings which cover long periods of time. A storm happens; it may last a month. A calm at sea happens; it may last a year. A freeze happens, a rain happens, a famine happens, a plague happens, a drought happens—and the happening of them is of indefinite and may be of prolonged extension. So a vacancy happens. It is a condition that may be short or long. And must we be told that it can not be dealt with according to its nature? It was the condition—the condition of emptiness—that the Constitution looked at; and if we were to construe the Constitution of the United States in severe and critical fashion, we would break up all the great decisions of John Marshall and the Supreme Bench and recede in our great march of national progress and national development.

Some Senator has suggested that the vacancy which a governor can fill must not be one that happens by efflux of time. I have before me fourteen cases, of which I will hand a list to the Reporter—I have not now time to read them—in which this body has said that the vacancy that happens by efflux of time is a vacancy which a governor may fill as any other vacancy:

Walker, of Virginia, in 1790;
Cocke, of Tennessee, in 1797;
Tracy, of Connecticut, in 1801;
Hindman, of Maryland, in 1801;
Condit, of New Jersey, 1803;
Anderson, of Tennessee, in 1809;
Smith, of Maryland, in 1809;
Cutts, of New Hampshire, in 1813;
Williams, of Tennessee, in 1817;
Sevier, of Arkansas, in 1837;
Bell, of New Hampshire, in 1879;
Blair, of New Hampshire, in 1885;
Marston, of New Hampshire, in 1889; and Pasco, of Florida, in 1893.

There is no point about this matter which has been so often decided as that point, and if the doctrine of stare decisis has anything in it, it ought to be left upon those fourteen cases, beginning in the early days of the Government, aye, with the first case, and coming down to a late period.

Much has been said about the case of Kensey Johns, referred to by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. But the Senator from Kentucky forgot to tell the Senate, if he noted it, that the case before that of Kensey Johns was antagonistic to it, and so was the next case after it. There followed a series of cases overruling the case of Kensey Johns.

Gentlemen, in the fervor of debate, like my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was a week ago, may say that we are trying to overrule the precedents of a hundred years. The committee is a little more moderate. It gives us seventy-five years. If they will look at the case from Arkansas in 1837 they will have to move their time peg up twelve or thirteen more years, for Ambrose Sevier, of Arkansas, was seated in this body in 1837, after a legislative session had been held subsequent to the vacancy, and a good deal would have to be put into the Constitution to get him here unless its construction is that which I am now advocating.

Mr. President, I have before me the opinions of twelve Attorneys-General of the United States, in the Administrations of Monroe, Jackson, Tyler, Polk, Pierce, Lincoln, Johnson, Garfield, Arthur, and Harrison. Those lawyer Presidents and their advisers have construed that the word "happen" means just exactly what I think it means. Lincoln was noted for common sense. He thought that the vacancy was intended to be dealt with just as I think it ought to be dealt with, and his Attorney-General, Edward Bates, so advised him, and Mr. Bates based his opinion in part, although it had many precedents, upon the continued acquiescence of the Senate.

Mr. President, a number of the other Attorneys-General have done likewise. I will hand this list of Attorneys-General to the Reporter, with the citation of the Reports of Opinions in which they may be found, that he may insert it in my remarks, for I have not time to read it.

Monroe, Attorney-General Wirt, October 22, 1823, volume 1, page 631, Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

Jackson, Attorney-General Taney, July 19, 1832, volume 2, page 525, Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

Tyler, Attorney-General Legaré, October 22, 1841, volume 3, page 673, Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

Polk, Attorney-General J. Y. Mason, August 13, 1846, volume 4, page 523, Opinions of the Attorneys-General.

Pierce, Attorney-General Caleb Cushing, May 25, 1855–57.

Lincoln, Supreme Court Judge Bates, October 15, 1862, volume 10, page 356.

Johnson, Attorney-General Speed, March 25, 1865, volume 11, page ——.

Johnson, Attorney-General Stanbery, August 30, 1866, volume 12, pages 323, 324.

Johnson, Attorney-General Evarts, August 17, 1868, volume 12, page 449.

Hayes, Attorney-General Devens, June 18, 1880, volume 16, page 523.

Arthur (not a lawyer), Attorney-General Brewster, February 21, 1883, volume 17, page 521.

Harrison, Attorney-General Miller, March 20, 1889, volume 19, page 263.

Now, Mr. President, this in conclusion: If it be true, as is suggested by the junior Senator from Wisconsin, that the vacancy must begin during a recess of the body which has the power primarily to act in order to make valid the appointment of the governor of a State here, then and in that event the vacancy must begin during the recess of the Senate to make valid a Presidential appointment, which is based upon exactly the same bottom.

Congress in 1863 passed a law, the Senate and House concurring with the Executive view of the meaning of these words, which, according to the opinion of Attorney-General Devens, shows the assent not only of the Senate but of the House of Representatives to the view that I am stating. Let me read it:

The act of February 9, 1863 (Rev. Stat., section 1768), is as follows:

"No money shall be paid from the Treasury as salary to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate, to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate."

As Attorney-General Devens says in Opinions, volume 16, page 523:

"This legislation, in assuming to act upon the salary of officers appointed during the recess of the Senate when the vacancies actually existed while the Senate was in session, must be deemed a recognition by Congress of the invariable construction given by the Presidents to the power of appointment conferred upon them by the Constitution."

And in so construing those identical words in our Constitution as applied to the President, we can not get a new set of dictionaries, we can not invent a new language, we can not throw down the meaning which we attach to them and say that in election cases we hold differently.

Mr. President, there is the plain meaning of our mother English tongue. A vacancy happens to-day in the Senate of the United States. It happens like sickness happens, and is in itself a species of political sickness. During every moment of its existence it happens, like the session of the Senate happens, from the moment it begins to the moment that it ends. It happens like a battle happens, from the time the first gun is fired until the last gun is fired. The governor of the State of Pennsylvania has the only power on earth to-day extant that can fill it. He has filled it. In my humble judgment his appointee has as good and honest a title to fill a seat in this body as have any of our peers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 4 o'clock has arrived. The motion before the Senate is that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to strike out the word "not" from the pending resolution. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "not," in the first line of the resolution; so that the resolution if amended will read:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURROWS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], but it is arranged that that pair shall be transferred to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. KENNEY], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS]. I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. If it be agreeable to the Senator from Illinois, I suggest that we transfer our pairs, so that we may both vote.

Mr. CULLOM. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. BUTLER. Under that arrangement I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA].

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay;" and if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENNEY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. Were he present, I understand he would vote "nay." Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when Mr. MALLORY's name was called). The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] is, as I unstand by arrangements made among Senators, paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RAWLINS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and I understand that he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope we may have complete order while the roll call is being recapitulated. Every Senator is interested in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order is important, so that the roll may be corrected if anything is wrong about it.

Mr. HALE. Before the recapitulation of the vote is commenced, I announce the pair of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. The Senator from New Hampshire, if present, would vote "nay," and the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea."

The Secretary recapitulated the vote; and the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Deboe,	Mason,	Shoup,
Baker,	Foraker,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Carter,	Frye,	Nelson,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Gear,	Penrose,	Sullivan,
Clark, Wyo.	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Taliaferro,
Cullom,	Jones, Nev.	Platt, N. Y.	Warren,
Daniel,	McComas,	Scott,	Wetmore,
Davis,	McLaurin,	Sewell,	Wolcott.

NAYS—33.

Allen,	Culberson,	McEnery,	Teller,
Bacon,	Hale,	McMillan,	Tillman,
Bard,	Harris,	Martin,	Turley,
Bate,	Hawley,	Money,	Turner,
Berry,	Heitfeld,	Platt, Conn.	Vest,
Burrows,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,	Wellington.
Butler,	Lindsay,	Quarles,
Clay,	McBride,	Ross,
Cockrell,	McCumber,	Simon,

NOT VOTING—22.

Aldrich,	Elkins,	Kean,	Pettus,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	Kenney,	Pritchard,
Caffery,	Foster,	Kyle,	Rawlins,
Chilton,	Gallinger,	Lodge,	Thurston.
Clark, Mont.	Hanna,	Mallory,
Depew,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the roll may be verified. It has not been verified, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the roll to be reread?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The Secretary again recapitulated the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nays have it, and the amendment is rejected. The question now before the Senate is on the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when Mr. CHILTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON]; otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. HALE (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. The Senator from New Hampshire, if present, would vote "yea" and the Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay."

Mr. KENNEY (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. Were he present and voting, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RAWLINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—33.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HALE and Mr. WOLCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that motion. I should like to bring up the conference report on the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a report.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I renew the motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senate had better adjourn; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 25, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 24, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADMINISTRATION OF CIVIL AFFAIRS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate joint resolution 116, reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 116. Is there objection?

Mr. MCRAE. I ask that it be read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Let the resolution be reported.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes."

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until the officer to fill any office provided for by the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," shall have been appointed and qualified, the officer or officers now performing the civil duties pertaining to such office may continue to perform the same under the authority of said act; and no officer of the Army shall lose his commission by reason thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to extend the time for the appointment and qualification of any such officers beyond the 1st day of August, 1900.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Insular Affairs, were read:

Add at the end of line 13 of the printed joint resolution the following:

"SEC. 2. That all franchises, privileges, or concessions mentioned in section 32 of said act shall be approved by the President of the United States, and no such franchise, privilege, or concession shall be operative until it shall have been so approved."

Further amend by adding the following:

SEC. 3. That all charters granting any franchises, privileges, or concessions, mentioned in section 32 of said act, to private corporations shall provide that the same shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal; shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds, except in exchange for actual cash or property at a fair valuation, equal in amount to the par value of the stock or bonds issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends, and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof, and for the purchase or taking by the public authorities of their property at a fair valuation. No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currrency, or of engaging in agriculture, or permitted to hold or own real estate, except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it was created. Banking corporations, however, may be authorized to loan funds upon real estate security, and to purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of all real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title. Corporations other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

Mr. MCRAE. I make no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there any arrangement as to time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I spoke to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] last evening, and he said that an hour would be sufficient.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve a point of order against the two amendments.

The SPEAKER. What was the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I spoke to the gentleman from Virginia last night, who is the leading member of the committee on the other side concerning the resolution, and he consented that one hour should be allowed.

The SPEAKER. Then it is understood that there is to be one hour's debate, thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and thirty minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that I reserved the point of order against the two amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement was heard. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HILL. That is all right. I want to reserve the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from Connecticut will present his point of order now. I yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin with the understanding that not more than one hour should be taken up in the consideration of the resolution. If the gentleman is to press his point of order after the hour is taken up, I can not yield.

Mr. HILL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order now. I make the point of order, in the first place, that the amendments are not germane to the resolution; in the second place, that the joint resolution can not be so amended; in the third place, that if so amended it must be considered in Committee of the Whole, and in the fourth place, that the joint resolution is temporary in its character and that the amendments are permanent.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not think this exact question has ever been before the House. I can not find any precedents precisely covering the case. However, in view of the character of the proposed legislation on which the point of order is raised, I do not think it would be well to have it pressed, for more reasons than one.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard on the point of order. This new resolution, which, as I understand, has already passed the Senate, proposes to amend the act which was passed here some time ago to provide revenues and civil government for Porto Rico. This joint resolution is necessarily an amendment to that. The resolution simply extends the time provided for in the previous act for the appointment of civil officers in Porto Rico. And being an amendment to that act, it seems to me there is no question that we have a right to insert this provision amending the franchise provision in the original act. Everyone who has considered the provision of the original act relating to the granting of franchises must note that there is no defense for it as it now exists; and it seems to me the House ought to take the first opportunity to amend it.

While there are other provisions of the act which I should like to see amended, it seems to me that the provision relating to franchises is the most serious mistake in the original act. There has been a great deal of criticism upon it from the public press and, in fact, from various sources. Hence I was sorry to see the point of order made against it. But if the point is insisted upon, it seems to me it ought not to be sustained, because the joint resolution itself is an amendment to the original act, and therefore this additional amendment is in order.

The amendment refers simply to the franchise clause; that is all. It requires that any franchise granted, in order to become effective, shall have the approval of the President; and there is an additional clause which was read to the House. I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon; but if it should be, there is no question that the amendment is in order, because the joint resolution itself is an amendment to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules all the points of order with one exception; that is the one as to the amendments not being germane to the original act. Bearing upon that point, the Chair will have the Clerk read a decision which squarely meets the question.

The Clerk read as follows:

1091. To a bill amending a general law on a specific point an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than to those of the bill was offered and ruled not to be germane. On February 6, 1891, the Speaker laid before the House the bill of the Senate (S. 4814) to amend an act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes. The object of this bill was explained by Mr. Lewis E. Payson, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands:

"The general forfeiture bill passed in the last session of Congress provided that as to certain characters of lands, which were in possession of parties claiming under the settlement law, they should have the right to perfect their entry within six months from the date of the passage of the act. That act became a law in September last. In order to effect the operations of the bill it became necessary to frame a set of instructions in the General Land Office for the guidance of the officers of the local land offices the country over. Owing to the pressure of business in that department, it was impossible for the Secretary of the Interior to prepare these instructions even down to this time. And the six months within which the settlers were to have the prior right of asserting their claims have now almost expired; * * * and to meet that point, and that point alone, the Senate bill was passed."

To this bill Mr. THOMAS H. CARTER, of Montana, moved an amendment providing for a method of classification to determine the mineral or nonmineral character of lands selected by railroads.

Mr. Payson made the point of order that the amendment was not germane to the bill, and therefore not in order.

After debate, the Speaker sustained the point of order, making the following statement in so doing:

"The Chair can only consider in determining the question whether the amendment be germane to the bill before the House and the proposition contained therein. The pending bill relates solely to the time when a period named in the original act shall begin to run. The amendment proposed relates to a reclassification of lands, a subject so remote from that of the bill that it can be justified only by a claim that any amendment germane to this act proposed to be altered would be germane to this bill. But the very claim is its own answer. The test must be the bill before the House, for that is the bill which is to be amended."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the point of order has been sustained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not passed upon it; he is about to do so.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that, if this proposition had not involved the amendment against which the point of order has been made, I should not have consented to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to be heard a moment on the point of order. As I understood the intimation of the Chair, the question as to whether the amendments are germane or not is the one upon which the mind of the Speaker is now resting. Now, sir, the text of this bill reads as follows:

That until the officer to fill any office provided for by the act of April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," shall have been appointed and qualified, the officer or officers now performing the civil duties pertaining to such office may continue to perform the same under the authority of said act; and no officer of the Army shall lose his commission by reason thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to extend the time for the appointment and qualification of any such officers beyond the 1st day of August, 1900.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know of nothing in the rules of the House that requires that such amendments as proposed may not be admissible to perfect a bill under these circumstances. But assuming that they should be germane to the text, it occurs to me that the two sections which the House now proposes to offer by way of an amendment to the original text of the bill are strictly germane to the original subject-matter of the bill. It is simply proposed to amend, by the text which I have just read, a bill recently passed. Now, the first section which is proposed as an amendment by section No. 2 provides:

That all franchises, privileges, or concessions mentioned in section 32 of said act—

This is the act proposed to be amended—shall be approved by the President of the United States, and no such franchise, privilege, or concession shall be operative until it shall have been so approved.

Section 3 provides:

That all charters granting any franchises, privileges, or concessions, mentioned in section 32 of said act, to private corporations shall provide that the same shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal; shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds, except in exchange for actual cash or property at a fair valuation, equal in amount to the par value of the stock or bonds issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends, and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof, and for the purchase or taking by the public authorities of their property at a fair valuation. No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currency, or of engaging in agriculture, or permitted to hold or own real estate, except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it was created. Banking corporations, however, may be authorized to loan funds upon real-estate security, and to purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of all real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title. Corporations other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

It will be seen that this is an amendment to the sections of the original bill—that is, section 32 of the bill—as it passed the House, and deals directly with the subject of the original bill and is manifestly germane to it.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the question of its being germane is to be measured by the fact as to how far the proposed amendment offered by the House committee touches the original text of the bill which the House itself passed. I think there can be no question that it relates directly to it and is a part of it. Both of them deal directly with section 32 of the original act, and that section deals with the question of franchises in the island of Porto Rico, to which the proposed amendments here are offered.

It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment would be germane not only to the original bill as it passed the House, but to the section of the bill now before us.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary to say a word, I think, on the point of order to show that it must be sustained.

The bill for the civil government of the island of Porto Rico passed the House and became a law and received the signature of the President. The pending bill is in no sense an amendment to that bill, but deals with another subject.

This is a joint resolution which provides for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of civil officers provided for in the act in question. It relates, therefore, to an entirely different subject-matter.

Now, the amendments here submitted are proposed to be inserted as amendments to a former bill under the pretense of amendments to the joint resolution now before the House. I am opposed to the amendments in form and in substance, and have made the point of order that they are not germane to the subject-matter which they seek to amend and are inadmissible under the rules of the House.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question about the force of the precedent which has just been read by the Clerk. But it is not conclusive as to the question which is now before the House for its consideration. In the case cited there was a bill to forfeit certain unearned land grants. The gentleman from Montana, when that bill was pending before the House, proposed an entirely new measure, which did not deal with the subject then before the House or the subject-matter of the bill, but provided for the classification of certain lands—to segregate agricultural from mineral lands and to secure to the Government the reserved mineral lands.

That, it will be seen, is a very different question from the matter now presented. Here we are dealing with a bill for the government of Porto Rico, and the resolution now presented is an amendment to the original bill for that purpose and provides for extending the time as to when it shall go into operation, and it is clearly in order to amend that bill in other respects so as to limit the power of certain officers created for the island.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution now before the House provides certain military officers shall be authorized to perform certain duties prescribed in the original act, which this seeks to amend. It seems to me, therefore, that an amendment providing how these duties shall be performed by these officers is certainly germane and must be in order to the bill.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Do you admit that the amendments only apply as long as the main body of the bill is in force—that is, the term of the officers themselves?

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. No, sir——

Mr. HILL (continuing). Then you admit that it applies to an entirely different matter?

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Now, I think the amendment applies to the officers who will be appointed under the general law as well as these military officers. Now, Mr. Speaker, information comes to the committee that they are already organizing companies to go into that island and purchase mortgages on all the lands, and to go into the purchase and sale of real estate in that island; and it was the desire of the committee at as early an opportunity as possible to put some restraint upon this speculation, and to prevent the occurrence of a great scandal which is sure to take place in Porto Rico if this law is to continue as it is.

Under the circumstances, I can not understand why any member should make the point of order against it. I should like to know what the gentleman's objection is to it. He is certainly not making it merely to show that a point of order can be made against it—merely to show his knowledge of parliamentary law—and I should be glad to know what the gentleman's objection is to this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to decide this question.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make this suggestion upon the point of order that has been raised. As I understand it, the amendments offered by the committee are objected to on the ground that the amendments are not germane to the original resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, that question depends on what is the subject-matter of the resolution. And how is that determined? It is determined by the title and the scope of the bill. Now, listen to the title:

Joint resolution to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes."

Mr. Speaker, anything is germane to that resolution that affects the said administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico. If this resolution had gone to this extent and said "to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico by extending the terms of these officers" from one date to another date, then the subject-matter of that resolution would have been confined within those words. But the subject-matter of the resolution, as shown in the title itself, refers to the civil administration of affairs in Porto Rico pending certain appointments, and any amendment that refers to the administration during that time of civil affairs in Porto Rico is, under general parliamentary law and under the parliamentary law of this House, germane to that resolution. And inasmuch as both the amendments offered clearly affect the said administration of civil affairs, then both of them are germane, and I think the Chair should overrule the point of order.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I desire to make a single suggestion, regretting extremely that this point of order should come from this side of the House, but realizing the strength of the precedent which has been read from the desk by the direction of the Speaker. The desire I have now is simply to call the attention of the Chair to the time when this point of order was made. I submit that it was made too late. The gentleman from Wisconsin addressed the Chair and asked unanimous consent to enter upon the consideration of the resolution, which had been sent to the desk and read. The Chair put to the House the question of consideration, and the House agreed to it. Then the consideration began by a suggestion from the Speaker as to what division of time should be made or what time should be occupied in debate. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin proceeded to say that one hour had been agreed upon as necessary, and as he was saying that, according to my memory, and not until that time——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me? The gentleman is entirely mistaken in his facts. "The gentleman from Connecticut" stood upon his feet when the bill was being read and addressed the Chair the moment the last word of the bill fell from the lips of the Clerk.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not know but what the gentleman addressed the Chair at that time.

Mr. HILL. Yes; and made the point of order.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. But I did not hear him at that time. I heard him interrupting in the middle of a statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], who had replied to a question put by the Chair. Now, the consideration having been entered upon by the House——

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. And the debate having proceeded to the extent of an observation by the Speaker and a partial reply by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I submit that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] had no right to rise and interrupt a gentleman in the middle of a speech and say that he reserved the point of order. I submit that this point of order is too late, and I ask the Chair to overrule it upon that ground, if upon no other.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the Chair will bear in mind that the point of order was made at the instant the Clerk ceased reading the bill and that the occurrence which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers to was the second time that the point of order was made. When I called the attention of the Chair to the fact, the Chair replied that it was understood, and it was understood at the time it was made at first. The Chair will recall that himself. The probabilities are that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] is referring now to the second time that the Chair's attention was called to the fact that the point of order had been made; and that being the case, of course his remarks are wholly inapplicable.

Mr. MCRAE. I want to make a short statement. I have already stated that if I had not understood that unanimous consent involved the consideration of these amendments, I should never have consented to it. I do not believe the present occupant of the chair will permit an injustice to be done to anyone. When this bill had been read, gentlemen on this side, members of the committee reporting this resolution, said to me privately, "We wish you would withdraw any objection you may have to it, because there are amendments suggested by the committee which we think ought to be made;" and accordingly, when the bill was read and the amendments read, I stated that I did not desire to make objection to the consideration of it. Now, I submit that the least that can be done, under the circumstances, would be to go back and start anew and submit the question for unanimous consent again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that much of the difficulty in the minds of members comes from the fact that the joint resolution sent from the Senate and the amendments added by the Committee on Insular Affairs all refer to the same statute, the Porto Rican bill, that became a law some time ago. The question as to whether these sections are germane can not be determined by the title alone, as has been suggested, because an act amending an act will always describe the title amended, although it may only touch one feature or part of the law; but the whole resolution has to be considered and the amendments to the resolution. If this was not clear, possibly the title would be brought into consideration. But there is not a particle of doubt as to the purpose of this resolution or as to the purpose of the amendments.

The resolution is for the sole purpose of extending the time in regard to the putting in operation of the new government of Porto Rico. The amendments are entirely outside of that question and enter upon amendments of the law in respect to matters entirely outside of that question. They have no relation in any shape or form to the proposition of the joint resolution. It will not be contended that if the Committee on Rules brought in a report to amend one rule, that thereby, by an amendment, you would open up for consideration of the House all the rules. A suggestion has been made by one gentleman as to the authority cited, and it is seldom within the power of the Chair to find an authority so completely on all fours like this. In that case the bill treated on the forfeiture of land grants, and the amendment was a regulation as to the forfeiture of lands, bearing upon the same subject, and that therefore they are not similar.

The case that the Chair has cited shows clearly that it was an amendment on the subject of the time when certain regulations went into operation. This joint resolution is for the same purpose. The amendments here are for wholly another purpose; and every member of the House must see that no one of these amendments is germane to the original resolution. Suppose the original resolution was before the House for consideration and a member should move to recommit with instructions to add these amendments. The point of order could be made at once that they were not germane and that the motion to recommit could not be held to be in order when it was asked to do in the House what could not be done in the committee. The case is perfectly parallel with the other. The Chair profoundly regrets that he has to sustain the point of order that it is not germane.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], however, submits a point of order against the point of order, on the question of the time at which the point of order was made. The Chair has directed the Clerk to bring the record here. The Chair is very accurate in his recollection, and this morning before the matter came up gave some thought to the possible questions that might arise, and had reached the conclusion that if consent were given for consideration of the joint resolution, that it was past raising the point of order. When the Chair was listening to a gentleman on the right, who addressed the Chair, he was also addressed vigorously and promptly by the gentleman from Connecticut, but who did not state that he rose to a point of order, and as soon as the gentleman got the attention of the Chair he made the point of order. Now, the Chair is not certain whether the matter had reached the point of consideration after he had declared that there was no objection, and has sent for the record to ascertain the facts, and will not be prepared finally to dispose of the question until the record is before him. The Chair, as suggested by one gentleman, will not permit anyone to be deprived of his rights if he understands what they are——

Mr. TERRY. I would suggest to the Speaker just a moment there——

The SPEAKER. I now have the record, and it shows this, and the Chair asks the attention of the House:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 116. Is there objection?

Mr. MCRAE. I ask that it be read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Let the resolution be reported.

The joint resolution was read, as follows.

Then follows the joint resolution.

Mr. MCRAE. I make no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there any arrangement as to time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I spoke to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] last evening, and he said that an hour would be sufficient.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the point of order against the two amendments.

The SPEAKER. What was the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I spoke to the gentleman from Virginia last night, who is the leading member of the committee on the other side, concerning the resolution, and he consented that an hour should be allowed.

The SPEAKER. Then it is understood that there is to be an hour's debate, thirty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and thirty minutes by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that I reserved the point of order against the two amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement was heard. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the bill.

It would seem, therefore, from the record that the matter was submitted to the House. That is the recollection of the Chair, that unanimous consent was given and two or three interlocutory remarks were made. Then the gentleman from Connecticut for the first time made his point of order. Subsequent discussion went on, when he made it again, and the Chair called the gentleman's attention to the fact that unanimous consent had been given.

While the Chair is clearly of the opinion that this point of order, if made in time, should have been sustained, the Chair is equally clear that his point of order came too late. If the gentleman had addressed the Chair in the first instance, when he was giving it attention, and said, "A point of order," the Chair would have dropped every colloquy with other members and given his attention to the gentleman from Connecticut, but that point was not made until the point of consideration was passed.

The House very well knows—it has been held over and over again—that after the question of consideration has been raised and the House has voted to consider a matter a point of order can not be raised. The question of consideration was submitted as soon as the bill and the amendments proposed by the committee were read, and the unanimous consent of the House was granted. This, the Chair considers, was equivalent to a vote that the House would consider the bill and amendments proposed by the committee. After that the Chair holds that the point of order came too late, and therefore overrules it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HILL. A question of personal privilege. I desire to state that while the bill was being read I stood in my place with the bill in my hand——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The Chair has stated the facts and made the ruling, and the gentleman has only one remedy.

Mr. HILL. I desire to correct the record. Am I in order?

The SPEAKER. What record?

Mr. HILL. The record which has just been read.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HILL. Then I will do it to-morrow morning.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced in the Senate and in the House in accordance with the suggestion of the President's message sent to Congress last week, in which the President recommended that there be an additional time allowed for the officers provided for in the recent Porto Rico act. The bill, as the House well knows, goes into effect the 1st of May. The President has appointed the governor, Mr. Allen; but he will find it impossible to make a judicious selection of the other officers required by the act within the time limited.

The resolution has been reported back by the Committee on Insular Affairs, with two amendments. I take it for granted that there will be no objection to the original resolution, as there ought not to be to the amendments proposed by the Insular Affairs Committee. The President, as I said, has appointed Governor Allen; and I think that appointment has met the approval of the press of the country, irrespective of party. The President in that selection has exhibited his usual excellent judgment in the matter of appointees, and has chosen a man who will reflect credit upon himself and upon the Administration.

Now, then, the two amendments which are proposed by the Committee on Insular Affairs are to remedy defects, and they are very serious and obvious defects, to the original act. They are defects which have attracted the attention of the country, the attention of the newspaper press of the country, irrespective of party, and in this connection I desire to call attention of the House and the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut to a leading editorial in the New York Daily Tribune of Thursday, April 19. I will not read the whole of it, but I will put it in my remarks, with the consent of the House. It is as follows:

FRANCHISES IN PORTO RICO.

The Porto Rican bill is obviously defective in several respects. Efforts are to be made, it is said, to modify some of its features at once. But it ought to be well understood that all the other matters in which it may need modification are significant compared with the want of definite and positive provisions regarding the terms on which franchises shall be granted. There ought to be, but is not, a specific requirement that no franchise of any kind shall be awarded without a fixed compensation for it to the public and one commensurate with its present and future value. If there are many franchises which would be reckoned worth merely a nominal sum at the start, but are likely to become enormously valuable with development of the island, the compensation in such cases can be fixed almost wholly in the form of a percentage on future profits. Others are of great immediate value, and powerful combinations of capital which are striving to get them would willingly pay large sums at once into the treasury of the island in order to secure them from competitors. In such cases the percentage of ultimate profits payable to the treasury might be small, but the compensation payable at the outset might be fixed by inviting bids.

As matters stand, the governor and a council will have unrestricted power to grant all franchises, with present compensation or without any, subject to the taxing power of the local government or under stipulations virtually depriving the government of that power. It seems marvellous that statesmen in Congress were willing to turn over to a probably temporary government a power so vast and far-reaching in its influence over the future prosperity of the island. Governor Allen is one whom the country trusts, but it is not in the least probable that he will find a council composed of men who have lived under Spanish methods and regulations fully competent at the outset to uphold him in a progressive and consistent policy for the benefit of the people. The President would undoubtedly be able, by the private expression of his wish, to prevent the granting of any particular franchise on excessively liberal terms. But his attention can not be constantly fixed upon such details, and the governor now appointed may at any time be removed by death. Powers of such far-reaching sort can not with wisdom be left entirely dependent upon the health or the personal watchfulness of one man.

The duty of Congress to make better provision for the protection of the public interests in this case is exceedingly clear. It will assuredly be regarded by the people of this country as a grave error if Congress neglects that duty. * * *

The committee sought to make assurance doubly sure, and therefore suggested the second amendment. We did not think the provision in the original House bill relegating the people of Porto Rico for franchises to Congress was sufficient, and therefore we put in both of these amendments, that the President shall approve the franchises before the franchises shall become operative; and further, that no franchises shall be granted except in accordance with the second amendment. There was a little dialogue in debate here yesterday which illustrates why the President ought not to be granted such power alone, nor in connection with eleven men who constitute the executive council, all appointed by the President.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] suggested to the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. LOUD] that there might possibly be an amendment to the bill then under consideration so that the Postmaster-General would have practically unrestricted power in the granting of commissions to clerks. The chairman of the committee stated in reply to that suggestion:

I do not think that the gentleman advocates placing in the hands of the Post-Office Department a discretion to employ clerks whenever they see fit. What would it result in? Postmasters-General and their assistants are but human.

If that objection was good in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa as to giving such power to the Postmaster-General in the important matter of the appointment of clerks to discharge clerical duties, how immeasurably more strongly does it apply to the provisions of the original House bill now proposed to be amended, which delegated to a council of eleven men, all appointed by the President, and only five of whom are required to be residents of Porto Rico, the absolute disposition of the property rights of the people of that island, for there is nothing down there more valuable than the granting of certain franchises, if we are to judge by the eagerness by which men have been trying to get them.

It has been said to me to-day—it was suggested yesterday repeatedly—"Why, there are no franchises down there that anybody wants. It is simply a question of getting somebody down there—getting anybody down there. Let them hold what they please." General Davis says in his official report to the Government:

At this time there is no operated mine in the island; but there are large iron deposits that are represented to be valuable.

On the subject of franchises and privileges, he says in the same report:

Although there have been many applications for these privileges, all have been denied. They relate to various objects, such as the construction of railroads and trolley lines, the building of wharves, the utilization of water power, the establishment of electric lighting plants, etc.

There is no State in this Republic which would consent for one moment to grant to any six men or any eleven men, with or without the consent of the President of the United States, the absolute disposition of the franchises in that State.

Let me reverse the case. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] to this proposition, and if he opposes these amendments he must be ready to say that he will adopt the propostion which I now suggest—that the President of the United States can appoint eleven men in the State of Connecticut, only five of whom need reside in that State, and that those eleven men can dispose of franchises in the State of Connecticut in their discretion and upon their own terms, and that if any abuse is proven in the granting of those franchises the citizens of Connecticut for remedy are relegated to a congress in Porto Rico.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman wish a reply now?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You can reply in your own time.

Mr. HILL. Will you give me time by and by, so that I can reply?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. You can get time from gentlemen on the other side.

Several MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). No.

Mr. HILL. Then you ought to let me reply now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill will be considered under the five-minute rule, I hope.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I said some time ago, no such proposition would be thought of in any State of this Union. Why, then, is it a good thing in Porto Rico? Let me read the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Yick Wo vs. Hopkins, United States Supreme Court Reports (Lawyers' Co, operative Edition), book 30, page 226. Justice Stanley Matthews in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language:

When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.

Having that principle in view—and it is fundamental in this Republic—every State has in its constitution thrown restrictions about its legislature so as to prevent abuses in the granting of franchises, and then in the pursuance of those constitutional enactments statutes have been passed. I have here the statutes of the State of Wisconsin, section 1753, declaring that "all stock dividends and other fraudulent issues of stock are" not voidable but "void." If stock dividends are void in Wisconsin, how can I or any other member of the Wisconsin delegation vote to permit stock dividends to be allowed in Porto Rico? The constitution of the State of Illinois, article 11, provides that if any railroad corporation in that State issues any stock dividend or other fraudulent stock that issue of stock shall be void.

How can any member of the delegation from the State of Illinois vote to permit stock dividends in Porto Rico when the constitution of their State prohibits them in Illinois? The constitution of the State of Michigan throws very powerful restrictions around the legislature there, so far as the granting of franchises is concerned—limits them to thirty years and their extension to thirty years, provides that all public-service corporations shall have their charges regulated, and then by statute they are regulated. What right have we to send six men or eleven men—just as good men, it may be, every one of them, as can be found—down there and give them the power in their discretion to grant franchises in Porto Rico? We would not tolerate such a thing in Wisconsin; we would not tolerate it in Illinois or in Michigan or in any other State. Who can defend the proposition to permit the granting of such franchises in Porto Rico?

May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used fifteen minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, in the indiscriminate abuse that we often hear heaped on corporations, simply as corporations. Many men who indulge in that sort of language are very frequently unjust, and not infrequently corrupt. Corporations are necessary institutions in business affairs, and we want them to go to Porto Rico as quickly as they can for the benefit of that island itself; that is, the corporations who will deal properly and justly with the people when they get there.

We do not want any balloon enterprises, which will take the people up into the clouds and then burst and drop them. We want business men, strong, safe, solvent corporations, to undertake the business of the island, and there is no restriction in that amendment which would prevent the going there of corporations of that character as soon as the civil government is established in the island. And these restrictions were made by the amendments to this bill to remedy possible abuses if they should occur. Of course we all know that there are abuses in many cases in the management of corporations.

I have here at hand a statement of Cook on Corporations which bears directly upon that point, showing how stocks are issued or watered. He says:

The third method of issuing fictitiously paid-up stock is by a wrongful use of the power to issue stock dividends. It seems to be generally conceded that if the capital stock and the actual property of the corporation is not permanently increased to the extent of the par value of the stock distributed as a dividend, then that the issue of stock by such dividend is irregular, and under certain circumstances fraudulent.

And Alexander, in his Railway Practice, says:

But I record my conviction that the practice of stock watering should be prohibited, without much hope of ever seeing it done, and more on the ground that it is against public policy to make it easy for men to build railroads, or float any enterprises with other people's money, than from the fear of the railroads being enabled to practice extortion by the possession of watering stock.

This bill—and that, Mr. Speaker, is all I desire to say at the present time—simply authorizes what we believe to be necessary modifications of existing law and throws about the legislative council the restrictions we think necessary to protect the people of the island of Porto Rico irrespective of any other consideration.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH].

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, a great deal of misinformation has been disseminated and many extravagant statements published throughout the country regarding the exportation of liquors into the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Porto Rico since they have been under the control of the United States; and for the purpose of getting exact information and laying before the House full information upon that subject, I addressed a letter to the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department a few days ago, and have his reply, which I desire to read and insert in the RECORD, covering the ground of the controversy. I read from the correspondence:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1900.

DEAR SIR: Can you oblige me with a statement showing the exportation of liquors from the United States to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands in 1899; also the number of American troops now in those islands? Numerous statements have been made indicating that the importation of liquors into those islands since occupation by the United States has greatly increased; and if it is practicable for you to also show the exportation of this class of articles from Spain to the islands in earlier years, I should be very glad to have that information.

Very truly, yours,

WM. ALDEN SMITH, M. C.

Hon. O. P. AUSTIN,
Chief Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of recent date, asking for information regarding the value of liquors exported to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands from the United States in 1899, and from Spain in earlier years, also the total number of troops in those islands, and, in reply, have the honor to hand you the following statement taken from the official records of the United States Government in 1899 and of the Spanish Government in 1890 and 1896:

Value of wines and malt and spirituous liquors exported to Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands from Spain in 1890 and 1896 and from the United States in 1899.

	Exported from Spain.		Exported from United States in 1899.
	1890.	1896.
Cuba	$2,536,470	$1,452,998	$1,001,426
Porto Rico	182,652	154,436	198,339
Philippine Islands	135,614	162,683	269,052
Total	2,854,436	1,770,117	1,468,817

The number of troops in the islands, as reported to me from the War Department, is as follows:

Cuba	10,729
Porto Rico	3,386
Philippine Islands	63,226
Total	77,341

Very truly, yours,

O. P. AUSTIN, Chief of Bureau.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
House of Representatives.

This shows, Mr. Speaker, that there has been less liquor exported to these islands from the United States in 1899 than from Spain in 1890 and in 1896.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I ask consent, Mr. Speaker, as I had not quite completed the reading of the letters, to insert them in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The Chair hears no objection.

[The letters referred to by Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH are published above.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has nine minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I take the time in order that I may yield a part of it, at least, to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. I yield to him three minutes, and may possibly yield the entire time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have five minutes remaining.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for five minutes. I will not abuse the patience of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in regard to the provisions of this bill that I am opposed to the two amendments, both in form and in substance. I am opposed to the first one on political grounds. I am opposed to the second one on economic grounds. I do believe that the whole suggestion of the granting of franchises in the little island of Porto Rico has been immensely magnified, and that it would be far safer and better to leave it under the jurisdiction of the people of Porto Rico themselves, with the able officers which we have reason to believe will be appointed there. If Governor Charles H. Allen, of Massachusetts, is not competent to pass upon the approval or disapproval of a street railroad franchise from the city of Ponce to its harbor, and other franchises in the island of Porto Rico, the President of the United States had better appoint somebody who is. It seems to me it would be unwise, knowing as we do the Spanish character and the jealousies of the natives there in coming in competition with Americans and others, which will be sure to provoke scandals, to throw the responsibility of this thing upon the President of the United States, who has enough else to attend to.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HILL. I have only a few minutes remaining. I want to call the attention of the House to the next section. So far as its provisions are concerned, making all franchises subject to repeal, nobody has any objection. It is a universal rule which obtains in every State in the Union.

So far as the second proposition is concerned, forbidding the issue of stocks and bonds except in actual exchange for cash or property at a fair valuation, nobody has any objection; and I want to say right here that I have no interest, past, present, or future, and want none, in the island of Porto Rico, because I believe there is no profit in any of these things. I think the people of this country have magnified it. I want no interest in any franchise or in any business proposition of any kind or character in the island of Porto Rico. I visited it, I went through it, I examined it to my heart's content, and I had all I wanted of it in any form or shape. I have no acquaintance with anybody who has any interest there.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And do not want any?

Mr. HILL. No, I do not want any. Any interest that I feel in this bill is purely on its merits as a general proposition. That settles that part of the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] some time ago.

The third clause, forbidding the declaration of stock and bond dividends and the regulation of prices, I fully concur in.

No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currency.

I ask this committee what it is going to do with the Spanish bank, which is now there issuing currency, and has a vested right to do it?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. HILL. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This clause that you are reading provides that franchises to be granted shall not provide for the issue of currency.

Mr. HILL. Very well; I admit that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It does not propose to take away any right vested by the treaty of Paris.

Mr. HILL. Then, will the gentleman explain to me the last three lines of this bill:

Corporations other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So far as applicable.

Mr. HILL. Yes, so far as applicable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, do you think that we have undertaken in that instance to deprive any corporation of any vested right given by the treaty of Paris?

Mr. HILL. I believe under the terms of this bill that the Spanish bank and every trust company in the United States which has made loans on real estate in the island of Porto Rico would be compelled to sell that land within five years after the title was acquired. I do not know whether there are any such. I have no personal acquaintance with them. I know such corporations are doing business in Porto Rico, that have gone there in good faith and made loans at American rates, not at the Spanish rates of 18 to 24 per cent, and that the passage of a bill of this kind, which clearly and distinctly would compel them to sell their land under existing conditions at the end of five years after title had accrued, is a wrong and injustice, and that those three lines of this bill ought to be stricken out, no matter what may happen to the remainder of it.

I believe that under the last three lines the Spanish bank would be forbidden issuing any more currency. I would agree with a proposition that they ought not, but that result should be obtained by compromise with them and not under the drastic provision contained in this bill. You have attached the national-bank law provision that they shall be required to sell land in five years to saving banks and trust companies that may exist now or in the future in the island of Porto Rico. Such a provision is perfectly proper in connection with a bank of issue, but it is utterly inappropriate in connection with savings banks and trust companies, whose business it is to lend money on land, and who, in the process of that business, frequently are compelled to take land to satisfy the debt.

I am not one of those who believe that the whole American people are a set of rascals and scoundrels who would go to Porto Rico and plunder it. I believe that the business men of this country are entitled to some confidence even in the House of Representatives, whether organized as trust companies, savings banks, or as sugar planters in Porto Rico. I believe that if this bill goes into effect you will prevent corporate capital of great amounts, or small amounts of aggregated capital, engaging in the cultivation in Porto Rico of sugar and fruit. If you stop the American Fruit Company and any other fruit company of the United States going there to attempt to develop the possibilities of Porto Rico, by saying that any such company shall not buy any of the lands, you will have absolutely put a damper on the island of Porto Rico from which it will not recover in twenty-five years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNOX. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended.

Mr. HILL. I think this bill is thoroughly detrimental to the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the balance of my time and ask gentlemen of the minority to occupy some portion of their time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, speaking for the minority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, I wish to express a hope that this joint resolution, as amended by that committee, may be passed. I had hoped that there would be no opposition to the amendments on either side of this Chamber. It seems to me to be so manifestly necessary that we should adopt both of these amendments, and adopt them at once, that it is incomprehensible to me how there can be objection from any source to ingrafting them upon this joint resolution. The act which it is sought to amend throws no restrictions or safeguards around the granting of franchises by the executive council, and only requires that such grants shall receive the approval of the governor of Porto Rico before becoming operative. This, it must be admitted, is a most extraordinary power and one capable of great abuse.

The first amendment provides that, in addition to the approval of the governor of Porto Rico, all franchises or other concessions shall receive the approval of the President of the United States. I can not conceive how any human being can object to that most just and reasonable provision. For myself, Mr. Speaker, I would much rather the amendment provided that all grants of franchises should receive the approval of the Congress of the United States before becoming operative. The bill which recently passed this House providing a civil government for the Hawaiian Islands provides that no franchises shall be granted in those islands which do not receive the approval of the Congress of the United States. This amendment simply provides that all grants of Porto Rican franchises shall receive the approval of the President of the United States in addition to the approval of the governor of the island.

The third section of the joint resolution, or second amendment, provides that certain restrictions, necessary restrictions, shall be thrown around the granting of these franchises. For instance, it provides that no corporation shall be chartered in Porto Rico for the purpose of carrying on the business of agriculture, and that no corporation shall be chartered for the purpose of engaging in the buying and selling of real estate. It is well known to the members of this House that the island of Porto Rico is only about 95 miles long and about 35 or 40 miles wide.

It is well known also that it contains a denser population than any other country on the globe, and that only a small part of the soil of the island is adapted to the cultivation of sugar cane. Unless these amendments are adopted I believe that it is almost certain that within the shortest period possible after the government provided for in the act of April 12 has been organized and put into operation the great corporations of this country will own every single acre of the sugar and tobacco lands of this most fertile island. And if that shall become the case, then the condition of the population will, I believe, be reduced to one of absolute servitude. The people of Porto Rico will be driven to cultivate these lands for these corporations at whatever daily wage they choose to pay them.

Therefore it seems to me that it is not only preeminently just that this amendment should be adopted, but that the necessity for immediate action should be apparent to everyone who would not like to see these poor people despoiled of their homes. Objectionable as the Porto Rican act is to me, Mr. Speaker, there is no feature of it nearly so objectionable as this, and no provision of it so open to abuse as I believe section 32 to be. Unless these amendments prevail it will be within the control of an executive council of eleven, only five of whom are required to be native inhabitants of the island of Porto Rico, to dispose, with the approval of the governor, of every valuable franchise in that island.

Such unrestricted power as the Porto Rican act gives to the executive council has never before been conferred in any Territorial act passed by Congress since the establishment of our Government. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is absolutely necessary, if we do not want to leave the people of Porto Rico in a position which, in all probability, will result in the loss of their lands and homesteads, and make slaves of them, too, that we should sustain the action of the Committee on Insular Affairs in its efforts to so amend this joint resolution as to safeguard and restrict the granting of their franchises. I do not believe it possible to pass any independent legislation having the same purpose in view.

Again, I express the fervent hope that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, at least, will agree with the minority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, that this legislation is not only highly proper, but imperatively necessary. I reserve the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I will detain the House that long. Personally I should prefer to see "the Congress" substituted for "the President" in this amendment. But it was thought by the committee that a provision of that kind would meet with more objection and be less likely to pass both Houses of Congress than the provision as it is now in the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, remembering as I do many of the provisions contained in the civil government of Porto Rico, I wish to say that there are a number of them that I would be glad to see amended, but I believe the amendment to this provision is more important than any other amendment that could be made, or more important, I will say, than amendments to all the other provisions, so far as the welfare of the people of Porto Rico is concerned.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says, "Why not leave the granting of these franchises to the people of Porto Rico?" The original bill does not give it to the people of Porto Rico. The power to grant these franchises is not vested in the legislature, including the lower branch, which is elected by the people of Porto Rico. They have no voice in the granting of these franchises; they are granted by the executive council appointed by the President, six of whom may be from this country and may control it entirely. So you see that the granting of these franchises may rest in the hands of these men, appointed here in the United States by the President, in no way responsible to the people of Porto Rico. I thought it was a very dangerous provision at the time it was passed, and I still think so, and I am anxious to see this amendment go in. As I say, I would rather see this franchise approved in the first place by Congress; but it is thought, on account of Congress not being in session at all times, that would meet with greater objection.

Now, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says there is little interest in these franchises. If the gentleman only knew the great appetite of a good many men and corporations in this country for franchises in Porto Rico, he would entertain a different conclusion from what he does. I believe at least one-half of the time taken by the Committee on Insular Affairs in hearings has been given to men in this country wanting a franchise of some kind in the island of Porto Rico.

The language of the provision as it is now is that the executive council of eleven appointed by the President have the power of granting exclusive and unlimited franchises in Porto Rico, worth thousands and thousands of dollars, without a single cent of consideration. The committee believe that it was wise that this restriction should be placed upon that executive council. According to the amendment, the franchise must be approved by the President. Not only that, but we restrain the President as well. We provide that he shall only approve them when they are granted on certain conditions and certain provisions, the most of which, if not all, are contained in the constitution and laws of almost every State in this Union.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Now, in regard to the particular operation of the amendment objected to by the gentleman from Connecticut. It reads as follows:

No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currency, or of engaging in agriculture, or permitted to hold or own real estate, except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it was created.

It had come to the knowledge of some members of the committee that there were men in this country already preparing to organize companies for the purpose of buying and selling real estate in the island of Porto Rico.

Then he objects to this provision, reading further:

Banking corporations, however, may be authorized to loan funds upon real-estate security, and to purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title.

Mr. Speaker, when I remember the limited territory in Porto Rico and the density of the population, we can see that this provision is much more necessary for the people of Porto Rico than it would be for the Western territory, where the people are more thinly settled.

Now, he objects also to the last three lines, which read:

Corporations, other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable.

What would be the use of providing that there should be no corporations organized in Porto Rico buying and selling real estate in that island and then permit the Connecticut corporation to go down there from the gentleman's own State, organized for this very purpose, and buy all the mortgages down there and become the owners of the real estate of that island? It is a wise provision and ought to remain in the bill, and if you take it out you might as well strike out the entire amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS). The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is recognized.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY].

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, if I were able to ingraft upon our legislation such provisions as in my judgment would best protect the people of Porto Rico as well as the people of all the balance of our country, I would provide that no charter should be granted to any corporation to perform a public function. I would reserve all these for the people's government. But inasmuch as the judgment of Congress, and, I might say, at the present time, the dominating influences of the country, are in favor of granting franchises to corporations to perform public service, I contend that the restrictions which are embodied in the pending amendments offered by the committee are wholesome and should be enforced on every corporation.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] seems to fear that we are about to make an onslaught upon some vested rights of some existing corporation, and he would have us decline to adopt a certain portion of this amendment which seems vital to its efficacy and if stricken out would permit corporations chartered in and outside of Porto Rico to operate there unrestricted. He intimates that he would permit existing corporations there to go on performing functions and exercising powers which these amendments forbid to new corporations, thereby making unjust discriminations.

Does the gentleman claim that there now exists any corporations in Porto Rico which are not subject to the legislation of Congress; that any corporation has vested rights over and above the powers of the Government? Mr. Speaker, I claim that the time has come when, if the legislative powers of this Government shall fail to put proper restrictions upon centralized capital in the form of corporations holding by their charters almost perpetual official existence and unlimited powers—I say if we fail to put wholesome restrictions upon these corporations, then we will compel the people in self-defense to find some way of abolishing every corporate charter that the law may have granted.

Mr. HILL. Now, without any frills whatever, will the gentleman answer this question: If a corporation is now conducting a legitimate sugar plantation in the island of Porto Rico, can it continue its business under the terms of this amendment?

Mr. RIDGELY. So far as we can make this legislation applicable to restrict their centralizing the titles to land and watering their stocks and bonds we should do it, and, without any frills, that is all this bill undertakes.

Mr. CARMACK. There are no sugar plantations there.

Mr. HILL. How do you know?

Mr. CARMACK. That is the information we have.

Mr. RIDGELY. I object to my time being taken up by a colloquy between other gentlemen.

I say that the amendments to this joint resolution should be sustained by both sides of this Chamber, and I believe they will be. I would enact restrictions still more drastic than these. But I am glad to know that upon both sides we have men who foresee the dangers which are now threatening the people everywhere by reason of unrestricted privileges of chartered companies. Even though it is rather late, I am glad to know that within two weeks, we might say, from the time we have legislated granting these unlimited privileges to incorporated companies in Porto Rico we are already aroused to the dangers in this direction and are bringing in this provision to put restrictions upon them for the protection of the people of this island at least. And the grandest of all things in connection with this amendment is the provision which reserves to the public the right of taking over at any time the property of any public corporation at its par value. These rights belong to the people and the law should ever hold them inalienable. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes and a half.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield four minutes and a half to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to occupy even that much time. The amendments insisted upon by the committee are in relation to the granting of charters and other concessions in the island of Porto Rico. These amendments throw around the original act as passed here a few days ago some safeguards which we think highly important. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] does not seem to think there is anything down there that is worth going for; and I take it for granted there is not, or he would not have come back empty-handed. [Laughter.] I think that is pretty good evidence of the fact. But we had some evidence before the committee, Mr. Speaker, that there are some other gentlemen who want to try their hands down there, and we want to regulate them to some extent—not let them take the whole thing at once.

These amendments, I would say to my colleagues on this side of the House, are only a few of those that we would like to see ingrafted upon the original act as passed. This legislation is good so far as it goes. The minority of the committee—that is to say, the Democratic members—indorse the amendment as offered by the chairman of the committee. We think it is correct so far as it goes and ought to be passed. If we can not get all that we want, we want to get as much as we can for the benefit of those people.

Now, there is one thing that suggested itself when my friend was on the floor, and that was about that bank provision. Whenever you raise the question of banks or the issuing of bank notes, if my friend from Connecticut is within hearing, you are going to hear from him. [Laughter.] The fact of the business is that he came down to the committee and advised them what they ought to do in regard to the exchanging of our currency in Porto Rico.

Now, there is something there that attracts his attention at least, and you can always rely upon him when there is a bank mentioned or a bank note in circulation, or something of that kind, to be discussed on the floor of this House. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether our people have loaned money down there or not. But suppose they have done so; if they have, they are secured. But it does seem to me that the object of the amendment is to keep the corporations already organized, in spite of what my friend from Illinois has said, in a condition that they will be responsible to the people who are largely interested in the island and in its future prosperity. We want to show them that we are not preparing through our corporations to monopolize all of the valuable lands and all of the valuable franchises in Porto Rico.

Of course if corporations were allowed to have their sway, such might be the result. But these amendments seek to prevent just precisely that thing. They could go on under the original act passed by Congress and allow the five or the eleven men to issue these concessions, and then it would be but a few years when all of this population in that thickly settled island would become paupers, just as in many instances we find with the Indians within our own territory here, and the object of the amendment is to preserve their interest and their rights in their own country and to make them, if possible, self-supporting in the early future.

Now, in some measure I agree with my friend from Connecticut, that we did not get a bonanza when we took possession of Porto Rico as a part of the war indemnity. It has been demonstrated that it is already a burden to us, and it is the object of the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs and those who support him to make it as light a burden as possible.

Mr. HILL. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDOX. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Would you vote for the provisions of that bill as applying to the State of Georgia?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly, as an amendment to that proposition.

Mr. MADDOX. In response to the gentleman from Connecticut I would say that if the other proposition had originated in Georgia, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And so would every member on the floor.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in concluding this debate, I simply desire to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. He was very solicitous in the course of his argument because of the provision in the amendment regarding the banks, and the disposition of lands which they might possess, or foreclose upon, within five years from the time of securing title. He said that this was one of the greatest hardships, especially upon the savings banks——

Mr. HILL (interrupting). I said, if my friend will permit me——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (continuing). And I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the provision of the charter of the Spanish bank, doing business in Porto Rico and to which he specially referred.

I hold in my hand a copy of the royal Spanish decree containing the charter and by-laws of that institution.

Mr. HILL (interrupting). It is not necessary for the gentleman to go into that. My suggestion was that the provision in question is a proper one as to banks of issue. Now, this bank to which he refers is a bank of issue, and I was speaking of loans made by such a bank on real estate within the Territory of Porto Rico.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not understand the provisions of the law has any more effect as to banks of issue than as to any other banks doing business in the islands——

Mr. HILL. Certainly not. I did not suppose the gentleman had. If he had supposed otherwise he would not have offered the amendments in the form in which they had been drawn.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Certainly not; because the security taken by the Spanish bank has nothing to do with the issue of money. They are required to dispose of the real estate of the bank under certain conditions and at stated times.

Article 14 of its by-laws is as follows:

> The bank can not own more realty than is necessary for its business. If it should acquire any by award in payment of the credits which it could not realize in any other manner, it shall proceed to the alienation of the same at public sale within the maximum period of ninety days.

So that the bank is obliged now to dispose of the real estate acquired by it within ninety days, and therefore it would be no hardship on the bank to require it to dispose of the land within five years.

Now, as to the agricultural lands being taken up by corporations. This particular clause of the amendment is proposed by the committee because of the peculiar conditions prevailing in the island. This island, as is perfectly understood, is a hundred miles long and about forty broad. That is to say, it is no wider than the distance from here to Baltimore and about twice that distance in length. In connection with this matter, General Davis, in charge of the civil affairs on the island, on page 12 of the testimony, says:

> Mr. CRUMPACKER. How are the lands held there—in large tracts or in small tracts?
> General DAVIS. Usually in small tracts. The population, you see, is 1,000,000, and the subdivisions of the land have been very numerous. Inheritances have resulted in subdivisions, so that you find blocks of 2 acres and 3 acres and 5 acres and 10 acres and 20 acres. There are a few larger tracts in some instances—the tracts of 200 or 300 or 400 or 500 acres; and of sugar-cane farms you may find tracts as large as 2,000 or even 3,000 acres, but such are uncommon.

Now, it is because of the peculiar condition down there and of the fact, as I think, that there is but one foreign corporation, and that an English corporation, engaged in the sugar-cane growing business——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me? Does he not also know that General Davis said that the only possible successful outcome of the sugar industry was through the aggregation of capital by corporations and by central mills? I have not the language before me, and I do not wish to take the gentleman's time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is immaterial what anybody testified to. The committee are of the opinion that it would not be for the interest of a million people, crowded upon a territory 100 by 40 miles in extent, to have one corporation own all, or substantially all, the land. People there can not cross imaginary State lines and go into other States as they can here in crowded and populous communities. There, when they get to the margin of their territory, they are met by the ocean. They can not go anywhere. They are obliged to stay in the island of Porto Rico, and the ownership of the land has a special significance in that limited and crowded space.

Therefore, this legislation must not be taken as establishing a precedent for legislation anywhere else. We establish this legislation for Porto Rico because of the conditions that obtain in that crowded island, and I repudiate utterly the suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that he is opposed to these amendments because he has confidence in human nature, and because Congress ought to have confidence in the people and in the business interests of the United States. You could say that and do away with the Constitution of the United States. You can say that and do away with the constitution of every State. That has always been the plea of tyranny, and it is the plea put forth to-day in behalf of the Czar of Russia that he does justice to his subjects and never will do them wrong, though he has unlimited power.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is a government of laws, not a government of men, and it is immaterial how high may be the character of the Executive—and for him I have as much respect as for any man who ever sat in the Presidential chair, from George Washington down. I have the most implicit confidence in the President's integrity, in his judgment, and in his high and exalted patriotism; but even to him I would not give the unrestricted power to dispose of franchises in the island of Porto Rico, nor would I give it to him in connection with six or eleven appointees, not because I distrust them in and of themselves, but because the principle involved is wrong.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Does the gentleman desire further time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have five minutes, and I will grant to the gentleman from Wisconsin so much of that as he desires to occupy.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is the duty of statesmen in trying to solve problems of statesmanship, when a little aggression is threatened and entered upon, to look at the principle involved and not at the possible minimum wrong to be inflicted. It is true that the individual wrong may be slight, but the principle involved in the aggression may be dangerous. You would not think of putting it in practice in Connecticut. It ought not to be put in practice in the island of Porto Rico simply because we have the power.

I repudiate the suggestion that here, as statesmen—and we are supposed to be statesmen—it is our duty to see what we can do, but it ought to be our highest purpose first to ascertain what we ought to do.

Mr. HILL. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the testimony before your committee show that the island of Porto Rico is practically mortgaged to its full assessed value to-day—the real estate, I mean—and that the interest rate on that is from 12 to 24 per cent, and that absolute necessity requires the reduction of the interest rate and the shifting of those mortgages before that island can possibly be prosperous?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, that the law which we have passed authorized the legislative council, the legislature of Porto Rico, to modify, amend, or alter any interest or usury law that now is in force in that island. They can fix that; but there is no way in which they can seize upon and destroy vested rights, nor deprive mortgagees of rights which are already possessed by them.

Mr. HILL. They can make inducements to capital to go there and lower the interest rate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Capital has been sufficiently induced, if the information which comes to our committee be correct. One prominent member of the committee, and a Republican, said he had been approached by a capitalist, who suggested to him that a corporation was being formed to buy up the mortgages.

Mr. HILL. And not a dollar paid in, probably——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but it would be paid in if they had the chance, under the original bill, to seize all the land on the island, and we did not propose to allow them that privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Virginia yielded some time to me. I hope that he will yield the balance of it to the gentleman from Tennessee, inasmuch as I promised to give him two minutes of my time and forgot to do so.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield such time of the five minutes yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin as remains to me to the gentleman from Tennessee. I do not know how much time he occupied.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He occupied three minutes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES. How much?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. A little over two minutes.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I opposed with all my might and influence the Porto Rican bill, now the law; and I am glad to have an opportunity to vote for or to support another measure that will tend to relieve the evils that I think were wrought by that bill.

I am specially, Mr. Speaker, in favor of that provision contained in section 2 which requires "that all franchises, privileges, and concessions in section 32 shall be approved by the President of the United States, and no such franchise, privilege, or concession shall be operative until it shall have been so approved." And why?

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, but what the Constitution "extends" to the President of the United States in all its limitations and prohibitions; and if he does wrong, which I do not say he will, he is amenable to the people of the United States; he is amenable to this Congress and its successors.

There may be some doubt, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the lawmakers of that unfortunate island are subject to any constitutional limitations, that the Congress of the United States would have the power to impeach the lawmakers there if they should do wrong. But thus leaving the finishing touches, at least, to the President, who is sworn to support the Constitution and to see that the laws are faithfully executed, these outlawed people would have some protection of our Constitution. For that reason it gives me pleasure to support this provision, which I think very largely helps to cure the evils and outrages imposed upon those people by not doing "our plain duty" by them. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to its final passage.

Mr. HILL. I call for a separate vote on the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 13 of the printed joint resolution the following:

"SEC. 2. That all franchises, privileges, or concessions mentioned in section 32 of said act shall be approved by the President of the United States, and no such franchise, privilege, or concession shall be operative until it shall have been so approved."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. 3. That all charters granting any franchises, privileges, or concessions, mentioned in section 32 of said act, to private corporations shall provide that the same shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal; shall forbid the issue of stock or bonds, except in exchange for actual cash or property at a fair valuation, equal in amount to the par value of the stock or bonds issued; shall forbid the declaring of stock or bond dividends, and, in the case of public-service corporations, shall provide for the effective regulation of the charges thereof, and for the purchase or taking by the public authorities of their property at a fair valuation. No corporation shall be authorized to conduct the business of buying and selling real estate, of issuing currency, or of engaging in agriculture, or permitted to hold or own real estate, except such as may be reasonably necessary to enable it to carry out the purposes for which it was created. Banking corporations, however, may be authorized to loan funds upon real-estate security, and to purchase real estate when necessary for the collection of loans, but they shall dispose of all real estate so obtained within five years after receiving the title. Corporations other than those organized in Porto Rico, and doing business therein, shall be bound by the provisions of this section so far as they are applicable."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DALZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10301. General debate having been closed by order of the House, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For postal service in the newly acquired territory or territory held by military occupation, and for additional transportation to and from said territory, also including postal service for all military camps or stations, to be used in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, $200,000.

Mr. GAINES. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill what evidence he had before the committee, or some of the evidence he had before the committee, upon which he bases this report and this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee addresses the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LOUD. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES. I simply want to ask the chairman of the committee for any evidence, or some of it, upon which the committee bases the recommendation that they make in this bill, providing for postal service in these insular possessions.

Mr. LOUD. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that this is a temporary service, that grew out of the war; first in the establishment of camps in this country and while our forces were in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. It is a service the cost of which can not be estimated anywhere near accurately. The Department asked for $300,000, and the committee recommend $200,000. It is a service that must go on.

Mr. GAINES. This service applies to Cuba and our insular possessions?

Mr. LOUD. I will say that the salaries of the employees in Cuba are paid out of the revenues of Cuba, and in Porto Rico so far as was possible; but, of course, in the Philippine Islands there are no revenues, substantially, and the payment for the service there has to come out of the public Treasury.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For printing and binding a revised edition of the postal laws and regulations, consisting of not less than 100,000 copies, such edition to be prepared under the direction of the Postmaster-General and printed at the Government Printing Office; and the Postmaster-General may authorize the sale of copies of such edition not needed for the use of the Department to individuals at the cost thereof, and 10 per cent added, the proceeds of such sales to be deposited in the Treasury as part of the postal revenues, $39,862, to be immediately available: Provided, That of this amount the Postmaster-General may pay to the assistant attorney for the Post-Office Department, who has been designated by him to prepare and edit said revised edition outside of office hours, not exceeding the sum of $1,000 upon the completion of the work.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I would like to occupy a few minutes, without following the bill. Some days ago I called attention to an error made in Judge Grady's book in regard to homesteads, in which he declared that a Confederate soldier could not take a homestead. It appeared by inquiry that he had received his information from a certain Congressman upon whom he relied. I was correcting his error in the House when some one insisted on giving the name of the ex-Congressman, which I did. Now, in justice to that ex-Congressman, Mr. Fowler, of North Carolina, I want to say that I am informed that inquiry was made of him by Mr. Grady as to what the law was, without attention being called as to the particular point, and in view of the complicated nature of the law he did not look up the direct question which was in the mind of the inquirer, and therefore, when he gave the information which was acted upon by Judge Grady, it was assumed that the law of 1862 still cut out Confederate soldiers from taking homesteads. The letter from Judge Grady to Mr. Fowler, which I have here, explains how it occurred, and in justice to Mr. Fowler I desire to print the letter in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman say that is the law now?

Mr. LACEY. Ever since June, 1866, a few months after the war, that exception as against Confederates was repealed, and I called attention to the error in Mr. Grady's book.

Mr. GAINES. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement. I remember I had occasion one pension night, when we did not have a quorum, to allude to the fact that one of the Tennessee ex-Congressmen, John H. Savage, an ex-Mexican and ex-Confederate soldier, was denied pension rights, while a Confederate soldier who had recently been in the Philippines was also denied the same pension right.

Mr. LACEY. That is not the matter I am alluding to at all. I called attention to an error in Judge Grady's book, in which he said a Confederate soldier could not take a homestead. He was led into it by Mr. Fowler, of North Carolina, and in justice to Mr. Fowler I think it is proper that this letter should go into the RECORD, because he says that Mr. Fowler's attention was not called to the particular point for the purpose of which the inquiry was made. I ask unanimous consent that I may print the letter in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: Mr. Grady is a former member of this House, formerly representing my district, one of my most esteemed constituents, and I would not have one word to say, but I hope that the gentleman from Iowa has in his former remarks absolved and will now absolve Mr. Grady from all intentional inaccuracy.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, certainly I did. He was mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. There is no more accurate scholar, no better posted gentleman in my district, or in the State of North Carolina than is Mr. Grady, and I hope the gentleman will absolve him——

Mr. LACEY. I did entirely absolve him before. I ask unanimous consent that I may print this letter in the RECORD. It will show that Mr. FOWLER's attention was not called to the point in question, and hence in his answer he inadvertently misled Judge Grady. The charge that ex-Confederates were barred from homestead rights was a serious one, and I thought it my duty to correct it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to by Mr. LACEY is as follows:

DEAR MR. FOWLER: In answer to yours of this date I have to say that your letter was understood by me as I gave it to Mr. LACEY. I did not have a copy of the United States Revised Statutes and, while I had Brightley's Digest, it brought legislation no farther than 1865, and my supplement did not go farther back than 1874.

My letter to you did not reveal my purpose. I simply asked if any change had been made in the act of 1862, affecting the beneficiaries of the law. Here is your answer:

Homestead act of 1866, section 1, same as 1864, with this restriction: That until the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act, no entry shall be made for more than a quarter section, or 80 acres, and in lieu of $10 required to be paid by said act the sum of $5 at the time of issue of each patent, and the public lands in said States shall be disposed of in no other manner after the passage of this act: Provided, No distinction or discrimination shall be made in the construction or execution of this act on account of race or color: Further provided, No mineral lands shall be liable to entry and settlement under its provisions.

Section 2. Amendment to act of 1862.

Section 3. Act of 1864 still in effect, except amendment contained in section 1, entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, June 21, 1866."

Homestead law of 1864 bears no members of the Army.

Hope this is what you wanted. If not, let me hear from you.

Have not been able to find copy of the Revised Statutes. Will forward it in case I can find one.

Very truly,

JOHN E. FOWLER.
Per KOONCE.

The date is June 7, 1897.

The law of 1862 excluded from the beneficiaries anybody who could not prove that he had been "loyal" to the North during the war between the States, and as your letter does not refer to any modification of this requirement, I took it for granted that the requirement was still in force.

I hope this is satisfactory.

Yours truly,

B. F. GRADY.

TURKEY, April 16, 1900.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post-offices: One at $3,500, 14 at $3,000 each, 2 at $2,500 each, 1 at $2,000, 8 at $1,900 each, 14 at $1,800 each, 26 at $1,700 each, 59 at $1,600 each, 68 at $1,500 each, 45 at $1,400 each, 124 at $1,300 each, 235 at $1,200 each, 219 at $1,100 each and 220 at $1,000 each; in all, for assistant postmasters, $1,312,000.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 25, preceding the word "for," insert "salary and allowance division."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOUD. I also, Mr. Chairman, offer the following amendment:

Page 3, line 2, strike out "fourteen" and insert "sixteen;" also, strike out the word "two," after the word "each," and insert "one."
Page 3, line 3, strike out the word "one" and insert "three."
Page 3, line 4, strike out "fourteen" and insert "thirteen."
Page 3, line 5, strike out "twenty-six" and insert "thirty."
Page 3, line 6, strike out "fifty-nine" and insert "sixty."
Page 3, line 7, strike out "sixty-eight" and insert "eighty."
Page 3, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "twelve thousand" and insert "forty-seven thousand seven hundred;" so that it will read "in all, for postmasters, $1,347,700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One hundred and eighteen stamp clerks, assistant superintendents money-order division, superintendents money-order division, superintendents of registry, superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, finance clerks, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, at $1,700 each, $2,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, now that the provisions relating to clerk hire have been reached, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what provision has been made in this bill for increasing the pay of the clerical force in the different post-offices of the country?

Mr. LOUD. The total increase for clerk hire is, in round numbers, $1,312,000, about one-half of which is for increase of force and the other half for increase of salaries, beginning at the lowest class of salaries and running clear up along the line.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That would be, I understand, about $650,000 for increases in salaries, making $100 for each of 6,500 men. Will the chairman state offhand how many clerks there are in the different post-offices of the country?

Mr. LOUD. There are carried in this bill 15,880. Included in that number there are, of course, agents in charge of substations, of which there are a great number, at salaries of $100, $200, $300, $400, $500. Of post-office clerks there are, as I have said, 15,880; carriers, 15,266, and railway mail clerks, 8,388.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. That would call for an increase of salaries of less than one-half the force—about 615?

Mr. LOUD. That is about the course we have been pursuing. That was the policy outlined last year—to endeavor to bring up the salaries of the clerks to a reasonable amount by metes and bounds of this character.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. These increases are made on the recommendations of the postmasters in the different cities?

Mr. LOUD. They are.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that as indicated in this bill there are only 66 persons in the postal service, as I read the bill, who are entitled to a salary of $1,600 a year; and in those 66 are included assistant superintendents of money-order divisions, superintendents of money-order divisions, superintendents of registry, and superintendents of stations. There are 118 included in this section, which would allow an average salary of $1,700 a year.

I know that clerks in our post-offices are paid very inadequately compared with clerks in custom-houses, and it seems to me—although I know that the chairman of the committee has given this matter very careful attention, and I know that the chief of the salary and allowance division in Washington is very friendly and favorably disposed to those clerks—that some arrangement might be made so as to give the clerks who have served a great many years better salaries.

I know myself of the case of a man in the Boston post-office who has worked there twenty years or more, and who, in the judgment of the different postmasters under whom he has served during the past eight or ten years, is perhaps the most efficient official in the whole department; yet he gets a salary of only $1,400.

It seems to me that with the great knowledge possessed on this matter by the chairman of the committee some provision might be made to give adequate salaries to men who have been devoting almost their whole lives to the service, and when we consider the fact—I would like to be corrected if I make any misstatement—that there are only 66 persons in the whole postal service of the United States, including not only clerks but assistant superintendents of the money-order divisions, superintendents of the money-order divisions, superintendents of registry, superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, finance clerks, superintendents of delivery, and superintendents of mails, who receive salaries of $1,600, it seems to me that we provide very inadequate compensation for a very faithful and efficient class of clerks.

Mr. LOUD. As an abstract proposition the gentleman's statement is a fair presentation of the case. There are but 66 who receive the salary he has named, yet there are quite a number who receive higher salaries.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. One hundred and eighteen.

Mr. LOUD. And when the gentleman goes beyond salaries of $1,200, he is getting into a class of salaries fixed by law a great many years ago.

Most of these salaries—in fact, 95 per cent of them, I may say—when you pass beyond the $1,200 limit, are fixed upon a certain percentage of the salary received by the postmaster. They receive the maximum salary received by the post-offices, and what might be regarded as good salaries in most cases.

The policy of the committee, Mr. Speaker, has been to increase these salaries from time to time. When we undertook the work we found that there was a large number of $500 clerks, while at the present time $600 is the lowest sum paid to any of them. We have been trying to bring them all up to between six hundred and twelve hundred dollars, as the business of the Department would warrant and justify.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has been fair to the clerical service in the Post-Office Department, and that the plan adopted by him in the committee to increase the salary of the clerk getting the small pay was an excellent idea.

But I wish to call his attention particularly to what I consider the unfairness in the matter of these salaries, and that is in this provision of the bill to which I have already referred, on page 9, of 66 stamp clerks, assistant superintendents of the money-order divisions, and so on, throughout the whole classification that I mentioned a moment ago, this number of 66 clerks who receive a salary of $1,600 per annum.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very unfair distribution of salaries; and if I thought the gentleman would not make the point of order against the amendment, I would introduce an amendment at this point to increase the number who should receive $1,500 a year to 100, and the number who receive $1,600 to 100. And I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if there is an objection to the introduction of such an amendment? It seems to be unfair that this provision should remain as it is in the bill.

I desire to make the following amendment: That in line 19, on page 8, the words "fifty-eight" be stricken out and "one hundred" substituted; and on page 9, line 1, the words "sixty-six" be stricken out and "one hundred" substituted; also, that in line 25 of same section "eighty-seven thousand" be stricken out and "$90,200" inserted; and in place of "$95,600" that there be substituted "$110,600."

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gent'eman will not attempt to amend several different paragraphs at the same time.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I will offer the amendment to each paragraph in its proper order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I feel compelled to raise the point of order against the amendment. This is, however, a very fine question, because I am not entirely clear in my own mind whether the point of order would lie against the amendment or whether a portion of the amendment is subject to the point of order, and yet I know that it would apply in this particular because the present law provides the maximum salaries which the clerks shall receive for performing certain services which are specified in the law.

The question is whether the House would not have the right, under the law, to appropriate for a thousand clerks at any salary whatever within the limits of the law—within the limits of $3,000 per annum for assistant postmasters—as they might desire.

But I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that the amendment would not accomplish his purpose. The question is whether the House would not have the right, under the law, to appropriate for a thousand clerks at any salary whatever within the limits of the law, or within the limit of $3,000 per annum for assistant postmasters, as they might desire.

But I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that the amendment would do no good. No clerk can receive a salary beyond the limit of salaries specified by law; and if he received one hundred or two hundred or any other sum which you please, the number of persons would be entitled to receive the salary specified by the bill, and you simply increase the appropriation bill without accomplishing any good to these employees. It would not increase the number of employees, in other words, and it could not be done without changing the law as it now stands. It would simply result in nothing, and not in the modification as contemplated by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Then, what provision is made in the Post-Office bill for clerks in the big post-offices who get one thousand five hundred and one thousand six hundred dollars a year?

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, in order to relieve the embarrassment. He can not accomplish anything in that direction.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that it is impossible in this bill for us to increase the number of clerks in the country who are to receive fifteen hundred dollars and sixteen hundred dollars a year, and that this House can not accomplish that through the medium of this Post-Office bill?

The chairman of the committee has just introduced an amendment which calls for an increase in the appropriation under the Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General from $1,312,000 to $1,347,000, and he added three or four to the number of assistant postmasters and all down the line. Now, if it is possible for him to accomplish the purpose which he sought to accomplish by that amendment, why is it not possible to accomplish the purpose which I seek to accomplish through the amendment just read?

Mr. LOUD. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, in good faith, that that amendment was offered to increase the number of assistant postmasters. Yet the salaries of assistant postmasters are fixed by law. The Chief of Allowance Division was absent in Europe at the time the segregation was made, and when he came back he found that there were not enough assistant postmasters appropriated for to meet the increase in the number which had been authorized since he went away.

This does not affect the salaries fixed by law, and I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that in order for a mailing clerk to get the salary referred to he must be a member of a crew, under the statute now in existence. The gentleman is seeking to increase by indirection the salaries of superintendents of money orders and superintendents of free-delivery service in small offices where they are not receiving the maximum of salary allowed them by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I think it ought to be apparent to every member of the House that an injustice is being done to clerks at the present time, when the chairman says that no matter how efficient a post-office clerk may be, or how long he may have worked for the Government, or how faithfully he has served, he can not get more than fourteen hundred dollars a year.

Mr. BINGHAM. As long as he has that place.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman misunderstood me. He may be promoted from the position he holds, but so long as he be a mailing clerk he can not receive more than the highest salary allowed the mailing clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. To what position may he be promoted?

Mr. LOUD. He may be promoted to the position of bookkeeper or assistant superintendent, or, in some large office, to be a superintendent of one of the various divisions, and thereby he can get a higher salary.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. The gentleman has just admitted the point I was seeking to make. This clerk I speak of has been in the Boston post-office for twenty years, and he is the leading man in that office. He has charge, under all changes of Administration, of the functions of that office, and there is not a part of the post-office business in the entire postal district of Boston with which he is not acquainted; but he attends to his business and does not interfere in politics, and therefore can not be appointed to be assistant superintendent; and yet by the law of Congress he can not receive a salary higher than $1,400 a year.

In the customs service the clerks enter generally at a thousand dollars a year, and it is an easy grade of promotion until they receive eighteen hundred or two thousand dollars. The clerks here in the Departments at Washington, many of them are getting sixteen hundred, eighteen hundred, and two thousand dollars a year, and yet the chairman of the committee has admitted upon this floor that in our largest post-offices under the law it is impossible for a man to receive more than $1,400 a year.

Now, if that is the true condition of affairs, it seems to me that the sooner we remedy that condition the better, because it is neither fair nor just, it seems to me. We should have an equitable system in the payment of all Government clerks. What I say of the Boston post-office is true of every large post-office in the country. These employees work longer hours than the custom-house clerks and receive smaller salaries.

They work longer hours than the clerks in the Departments in Washington. They get but fourteen days' vacation, while the employees in the Departments here get thirty days' vacation and thirty days' sick leave. Yet these post-office employees can not receive more than $1,400 a year. What incentive or encouragement is there for a man to do efficient work or to continue in the post-office business at a salary of $1,400 a year, which is the limit of salary?

I know that what I say here this afternoon in regard to the pay of these clerks meets with the approbation of the Post-Office Department, because a few weeks ago, when the postmaster of Boston was down here, he tried to find some way to increase the salary of this clerk whom I have mentioned before, but under the law it was found impossible to do so.

It seems to me, as long as we are on this bill, and the chairman of the committee has admitted this inequality in salaries, some provision ought to be made, and I do not see why, if the amendment is carried on this bill, it will not have the force of law if passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I desire to say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I strongly favor the classification bill which is now before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I think it ought to be reported in its present or amended form.

The post-office clerks are a faithful, intelligent class of public servants, and we should accord them decent treatment.

I do not think it comports with the history or dignity of this great Republic to have a law upon our statute books which prevents a clerk in the post-office, after he has spent the best portion of his life in this branch of the Government service, from receiving more than $1,400 a year. I have great confidence in the present head of the salary and allowance division, and I would be willing that he should assume this responsibility, and I am confident that justice would be done both interests.

Does the gentleman from California renew his point of order or make the point of order?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can insist upon the point of order, because I do not think it would hold, but let me say to the gentleman, in good faith, that he can not accomplish the object he has in view by increasing the number of these clerks.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman agree to bring a bill which will remedy matters so that as to clerks in the first and second class post-offices, wherever the Post-Office Department may think it wise, they can have these salaries increased?

Mr. LOUD. Well, I can not put myself under bond to determine a matter in the future. Of course I am only one member of the committee.

Mr. COWHERD. If the Chair will permit me, several gentlemen around me have asked a question which I think the gentleman from California can answer. Do I understand him that one objection to the amendment would be in effect that the law has provided, for instance, what offices shall have assistant superintendents, and, whether you double the number named in this bill or not, it does not make any difference in the number of officers, because that is fixed by law?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly not.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the committee will vote the amendment down, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, line 19, strike out the words "fifty-eight" and insert "one hundred;" and in line 25 strike out the words "eighty-seven thousand" and insert "ninety thousand two hundred."

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, line 1, strike out the words "sixty-six" and insert the words "one hundred;" and in lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "one hundred and five thousand" and insert "one hundred and ten thousand."

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fifty-two assistant superintendents money-order division, assistant superintendents of registry, superintendents money-order division, superintendents of registry, superintendents of stations, bookkeepers, superintendents of delivery, superintendents of mails, and cashiers, at $1,800 each, $93,600.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he would not recur to page 3 of the bill, in reference to clerks in charge of substations, and inform the House whether the number of clerks in charge of substations is materially increased in this bill over former years, if he can? While the gentleman is obtaining his information, I wish to call his attention to the condition of affairs in my own district. I represent a large portion of the southern part of the city of Chicago. Up to the time of annexation, a few years ago, there were probably thirty, forty, or fifty small post-offices in that territory, in little hamlets and little villages.

When that territory was annexed to the city the Post-Office Department included it within the limits of the Chicago post-office and abolished all these local post-offices. Up to a year ago they had stamp agencies located in all of these territories, so that parties could purchase stamps and other post-office supplies there; but in the last bill the stamp agencies were all abolished and in their place a few substations have been located. I understand that the Department proposes to ask for quite an increase in the number of substations, if they do not receive authority to relocate stamp agencies, and that is the reason why I asked the gentleman the question.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that I have sent for the table. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], on the margin of his bill, shows for that class of clerks we increased it 150. We have given every clerk that the Post-Office Department has asked for. My recollection is from one to five hundred dollars, which includes these substations; that there is an increase of some six or seven hundred, as many as the Department has asked for. I have not the exact figures, but will have them later.

Mr. MANN. I will call the attention of the gentleman to it, privately, later.

Mr. LOUD. We have given all they asked for and all they thought could possibly be used.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for clerk hire in post-offices, $12,754,700.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 16, after the word "dollars," add: "Provided, That the Postmaster-General may in the disbursement of this appropriation allow postmasters at first-class offices to employ temporary clerks at the rate of 25 cents an hour during the rush or busy hours of the day."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental or purchase of canceling machines and motors, and power therefor, $150,000.

Mr. LOUD. I desire to submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 18, after the word "dollars," insert: "Provided, That 5 per cent of the foregoing appropriation for the salary and allowance division of the First Assistant Postmaster-General's bureau may be available interchangeably for expenditures on the objects named, but no one item of the appropriation shall hereby be increased more than 5 per cent."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Free-delivery service: For pay of letter carriers in offices already established, and for substitute letter carriers, and for temporary carriers at summer resorts, holiday, election, and emergency service, $14,787,600.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard many warm and eloquent tributes paid upon the floor of this House to the boys who have worn the blue of Uncle Sam's Army; we have heard many words of kindness expressed for the boys who wore the blue of Uncle Sam's Navy; and I propose now on the floor of this House to say a word in behalf of the boys who wear another blue of Uncle Sam, and that is the gray blue of Uncle Sam's letter carriers. Mr. Chairman, I believe in economy in governmental matters, but I believe that economy can be carried too far.

I believe it is not always the best service that is procured for the least money. When the letter carriers of this country ask us to increase their salaries, I think they are only asking what is just and right, for of all classes of skilled labor I know none so poorly paid as the letter carriers. But we are told that in the free-delivery service we have a tremendous expense on the Government. Is it known to the members of this committee that it is officially stated that about 70 per cent of the official revenues of the United States from the Post-Office Department—about 70 per cent of the gross revenues, of the entire receipts of the post-office—are from the free delivery? In addition to that I might say that at present there are 777 free-delivery offices. I was informed this morning at the Post-Office Department that by the 1st of July there would probably be 800 free-delivery offices. There are about 72,000 other offices, leaving a difference of about 71,000 offices not first-class post-offices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been demonstrated that wherever a free delivery has been placed, wherever the letter carriers are carrying around the mail, that the intermural mail, and by that I mean the mail that passes in the city and that does not go out of it, more than pays the expenses of the entire service of these free-delivery offices in all first and second class post-offices. While I have not the figures to prove that, I was informed this morning at the Post-Office that such was the fact. Take the rural free delivery in Carroll County, Md., and the receipts increased $1,500 on a quarter of $6,400, or about 23½ per cent. Comparison between that and the city free delivery would show a larger proportion of increase, for if it increases in the rural free delivery, it certainly would increase in the free deliveries in the city. Therefore I contend that this branch of the service is the most prosperous and most profitable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that in this the most profitable branch of the service it seems to me that this great Government can well afford to increase the pay of the letter carriers of the United States. The present system is such that they receive $600 the first year, $800 the second year, $1,000 the third year, and after that $1,000 per annum.

Now, what do they ask? The only difference is that for the fourth year and thereafter they may receive $1,200. It does not seem to me that this is unreasonable. We are told by the chairman of the committee that they have increased the salaries of a number of clerks in the post-offices and have arranged for more clerks. I am told by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that there is also a proposition to increase the salary of the railway mail clerks. While we have a surplus in the Treasury, if it is to be the policy of the Administration to expend it on various matters of great and minor public importance, I say let us go into the business of increasing the salaries of these poorly paid post-office clerks and carriers, so that they may derive some of the benefit of this surplus. Certainly if the clerks in the post-offices are to have their salaries increased and the railway mail carriers are to have their salaries increased, the letter carriers ought to receive the same benefit.

Back in the Fifty-fourth Congress the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] reported favorably a bill increasing the pay of the letter carriers, and in that report, which is very strong, he says:

The free-delivery service is now a source of quite a large income to the Government, and should this bill become a law it would still be more than self-sustaining. It is believed that the carriers, who are faithful and who are to be advanced under the provisions of this bill, having full knowledge of their duties and the residences of those they serve, would be willing to continue in the discharge of their duties and would not be looking for other positions if this change in salaries could be obtained. It would put the service on a more stable foundation, and the benefits intended to be derived from the civil-service laws would be realized in part should this bill become a law.

A carrier enters the service as a substitute at a salary of $1 per year and the pro rata salary of the carrier whose route he serves. Several years may elapse before he receives a regular appointment, and is entitled to the lowest pay provided by this bill.

The carrier's life is a hard one. He is exposed to all kinds of weather—the summer's heat and the winter's cold. The service they perform is a severe tax upon their constitutions, and they grow old very fast in the service.

We quote from the report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1889:

"From the inauguration of the free-delivery system, July 1, 1863, until June 30, 1874, the cost of the service exceeded the receipts from local postage. On June 30, 1875, the system had become self-sustaining, with a balance over of $67,517.55. From that day the balance on the credit side increased from year to year until, on June 30, 1889, it had reached the sum of $2,578,979.92, an amount far in excess of the expectations of its founders.

"It will be noticed that the number of pieces of mail handled by carriers during the last fiscal year was 3,085,805,510, an increase over the preceding year of 454,943,782. Notwithstanding this almost fabulous result, it is proper to state that the complaints which reach this office on account of misdelivery of mail, delay in delivery, delivery to wrong address, and other errors of the carrier will not exceed 300 per year."

It is believed that the amounts named in this bill for their salaries are not too large when we take everything into consideration. We therefore believe the bill to be a just and proper one and cheerfully recommend its passage.

The above report was an indorsement of a bill providing for the same rates of pay as stated above.

The carrier's life is a hard one. Under the hot rays of the summer sun, in zero weather, in winter amid the ice and snow and rain, these men, each and every one, go out day by day delivering their messages of weal or woe. Mr. Chairman, I contend, in consequence of their exposure to all kinds, sorts, and conditions of weather, that the natural length of their lives is shortened; and even if they do arrive at a period of old age, after they have spent years and years in the postal service of the United States, they have had little opportunity to lay aside anything for that old age.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of increasing the salary of the letter carriers. My friend near by suggests that I offer an amendment to the bill providing for an increase of their salaries, but realizing that under Rule XXI of this House there is no opportunity whatever for such an amendment being accepted by this committee, I know it would be useless.

The rules of the Post-Office Department for the governing of letter carriers are, of necessity, very strict, for, above all others, the delivery of the mails is the one branch of the Government service requiring absolute accuracy.

In every mercantile pursuit every employer overlooks errors occasionally made by their most competent and reliable employees, but the United States Post-Office Department seldom overlooks even the slightest errors of letter carriers.

The position requires honesty, capability, industry, the best of references, character, certificates, sobriety, and courteousness. Surely men possessed of all these attributes are worth more than $1,000 maximum yearly salary.

It is, too, to the mutual advantage of the Government and citizen alike to have these men remain in the service, for, traveling daily over the same route as they do they become familiar with the names of all the people over the route so traveled, the mail service consequently being much more satisfactory through increased punctuality of deliverance of mail, and much more accurate through increased familiarity with the residents.

The increased expenditure of Governmental money would not be so great when the fact is taken into consideration that there are but 15,266 letter carriers and 3,500 substitute carriers in the United States.

We who represent districts which are blessed with the free-delivery system know full well the character of the men whose cause we are espousing, for the vast majority possess the qualities mentioned above, and they perform their arduous duties in a manner creditable alike to the Government and the people.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether or not there is a bill before his committee providing for the increase of the salaries of letter carriers?

Mr. LOUD. If my recollection serves me correctly, there is such a bill there.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask whether the committee has granted the carriers any hearing on that bill?

Mr. LOUD. There has been no hearing before the committee in relation to that subject.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Has there been a request from the letter carriers for a hearing?

Mr. LOUD. There has been a request lately from a gentleman, I believe by the name of Parsons, who desires to be heard on behalf of the letter carriers.

Mr. CUMMINGS. A gentleman who was formerly president of the Letter Carriers' Association. Now, I wish to ask also whether it is the intention of the committee to give a hearing on this question?

Mr. LOUD. I think it very probable. We give about everybody a hearing that wants one. No one can deny that.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is it not true that such a bill has been twice within the last eight years reported from that committee favorably?

Mr. LOUD. I think so; once or twice, I believe, when the gentleman's party had control of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There was one favorable report while Mr. Reed was Speaker, made by the Hon. N. D. SPERRY, of Connecticut. This was while you were chairman of the committee. Now, I would make this request: If the gentleman's committee should again see fit to report the bill favorably, will they not be kind enough to ask the Committee on Rules for a special order providing for the consideration of the bill in the House, and not hang it up by a string where it will be possible for the House to see it and impossible for the House to reach it?

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman ask me that question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. That is a hypothetical and contingent question which at the present time I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I am grateful to the gentleman for the information which he has given me, and which I understand is correct. It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that if such a bill can be brought before this House it will be passed, and that is the reason it has always been held up.

Mr. CORLISS. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert at the end of line 23, page 12, the following:

"That substitute letter carriers in cities of the first class, who may be now or hereafter employed as such, shall serve a probationary period not to exceed six months, and shall then become eligible to appointment as regular carriers, at a salary of $600 per annum; and if not so appointed regular carriers at the expiration of one year additional, they shall then become eligible for appointment to the next highest grade, when, if not appointed regular carriers for one year additional, or at the end of two years or thereafter, they shall then become eligible for appointment to the next highest grade. That in second-class cities substitute letter carriers shall serve a probationary period not to exceed six months, and shall then become eligible for appointment at the salary of $600 per annum, when, if not so appointed at the expiration of one year additional, they shall then become eligible to appointment to the next highest grade. When a substitute carrier is promoted to a regular carrier at any time between the minimum and maximum periods of eligibility, in any grade, then the time employed as substitute carrier over the minimum period of eligibility in that grade shall count as a factor in his favor by promotion to the next highest grade."

Mr. LOUD. I raise a point of order against that amendment as new legislation.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask the gentleman to reserve that point of order for a few moments till I can be heard.

Mr. LOUD. I have no objection to the point of order being reserved.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, it is possible that a point of order can be sustained against this amendment, but I desire to call attention to the necessity of legislation along the line suggested by the amendment.

It is well known that in all the large cities the service requires a large number of substitute letter carriers. To-day they receive simply the compensation that they can obtain in consequence of the illness or absence of the regular letter carriers.

I have filed with the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a tabulated statement showing the service of the 25 letter carriers of my city and the amount of money received by them during the last year, from which it appears that only about $30 a month has been paid to the substitute letter carriers—less than the wages of a common laborer. Yet these men are compelled to serve the people, to be in attendance every day at the post-office; and they are prevented from obtaining a livelihood in any other vocation, and compelled to serve one, two, and possibly five years before they can be promoted to the regular service as letter carriers.

I am strongly in favor of the recognition of public service. We are constantly passing legislation here giving increased compensation to various officers some of whom already receive liberal salaries. In this bill I find an increase of superintendents' compensation, to which I do not object. But I submit that of all public service rendered in our country there is none that is so poorly paid as that of substitute letter carriers. They have no salaries attached to their office. Their positions are not permanent, as everybody understands. They depend solely upon conditions, depend upon vacancies, and the absence of the regular carriers.

I think so far as that is concerned that the letter carriers themselves are most inadequately paid, when compared with the services rendered by them with pay given to other employees in the various other branches of the Government; and I call the attention of the committee to the fact that I represent a district on this floor which is deeply interested in this matter. I have asked the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to consider two measures presented before them, one for the increase of the salary of the regular letter carriers, and the other for the consideration of the very measure which I have presented. I have asked a hearing for these two measures.

I have filed statements showing that the substitute letter carriers received only about $1 a day on an average for their services, a totally inadequate compensation. It is outrageous, and I hope and trust the chairman of the committee will recognize the merits of the amendment as a matter of justice in behalf of the letter carriers and will withdraw the point of order and not insist upon his objection to the amendment. I hope at least that he will permit the amendment to come before the committee and be acted upon without any technical objection.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will withdraw the point of order upon the amendment which has just been proposed. It seems to me that something ought to be done in this bill in the matter of regulating the salaries of the substitute letter carriers, as well as taking some action on the increase that the letter carriers who have served four years or more have been asking for the past half dozen years.

In the large cities throughout the country I venture to say that there is not a member representing any of them upon the floor of this House who has not seen the necessity and the justice of this increase of the salary of the letter carriers, and I venture to say there is not a member who has not agreed to support this increase when the matter came before the House for consideration. Of course it may be suggested that the rules of the House forbid such an amendment if the point of order is made.

But yet, Mr. Chairman, it would be easy enough if the amendment were offered here, and the point of order was made by the gentleman from California in charge of the pending bill, to appeal from the decision of the Chair and let the House have a direct vote upon the proposition. The hypocrisy of the House and the rulings of the Chair from time to time or from day to day and from one end of Congress to the other are discreditable to this House and an offense to the intelligence of the people of the United States.

If the majority side present an amendment and wish it passed, there is no trouble about it. It is in order, no matter what suggestions may be made against it; but if it is made by the minority and not wanted by the leaders on the majority side, it is held not to be in order and is ruled out on technical grounds. The conflicting decisions of the occupants of the Speaker's chair upon the different points of order raised here is discreditable to the House of Representatives, and it is about time that the House should stop it.

Now, in regard to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], I know of cases myself in the post-office in Boston where young men who have served as substitute letter carriers for five years past are yet down fifty or sixty points in number on the eligible list. On the 1st of July they will get a notice to report to the post-office for about two months' work, and if they do not present themselves and unless excused their names will be dropped and they lose all chance of becoming permanent carriers, while if they do report and go to work for these two months they will lose the employment they were engaged in.

It does not seem fair, and it does seem to me, as a matter of justice and equity, that some remedy ought to be had and not compel these boys to remain on the eligible list six or seven or eight years before getting permanent employment, if even then they get it, while in the meantime they are given about two months' work in the summer time and are deprived of the opportunity of working in the business in which they have been employed; while they must purchase their own uniforms and serve Uncle Sam for fifty or sixty days a year.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Why is this done? Is it not because the people succeed in getting places who have a political pull, while those who fail have not?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the postal service in the city of Boston is conducted fairly on the civil-service basis, and every man who takes the letter-carrier examination or the examination for the clerical service and succeeds has his name posted publicly on the walls; and there is not a case since the time of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration, then following through Mr. Harrison's, then the second Administration of Mr. Cleveland, and during the present Administration, where the rule has not been absolutely carried out.

I have watched the list time and time again, and never was a man or a boy passed over on the list after he had succeeded in passing the examination, no matter what the influence might be which was exerted in behalf of some one who was lower down on the list.

The men who are on the regular force are entitled to their vacation, and numbering eight or nine hundred, as they do, it requires about 125 or 150 substitutes to be ready to work for those two months in the year; and the point I make is that those boys are compelled to give up their regular employment, to leave their work, to buy their uniforms, work two months in the year, and then go out and look for some other employment, and I do not think that the process is fair.

Therefore, I hope that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], who I know is willing to be fair in matters of this kind, will withdraw his objection to this amendment, and also withdraw his point of order on the question of the increase of the salaries of letter carriers, and let us do away with this hypocrisy that prevails in this House, from one end of it to the other, and this system of promising at election time to do this and that, and then when we get in the House refuse or neglect to do it or hide behind the point of order.

This Government is rich enough to afford decent salaries to the letter carriers, and I hope that this matter of increase in the salaries of letter carriers to $1,200 a year will be acted upon favorably to-day.

The members of the police and fire departments in all large cities in the country are paid twelve and in some cases fourteen hundred dollars per year, and why this recognition should be denied to as faithful and deserving a class of public servants as the letter carriers is more than I can understand.

I wish the gentleman from California would withdraw his point of order, if for no other purpose than to expose those members of the House who are profuse in their promises to the letter carrier about election time, but seem to forget the existence of the letter carrier when it comes to the redemption of the promise.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I merely rise as a member of the committee to reply to some of the suggestions and insinuations which have been made that the committee are tying up the classification bills which are before them, and that in collusion, possibly, with the Speaker of the House, as intimated, none of these measures are to come before the House. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is no committee of this House that has been more occupied with the public business brought before it than the Post-Office Committee during this present session. For a long time that committee met three and four times a week, not only in the morning during the regular hours devoted to committee meetings, but during the sessions of the House in the afternoon. They have had many important hearings upon various bills before the committee, and they have worked earnestly and laboriously to get the business that is brought to them before the House.

Now, when this appropriation bill was in preparation, the question was asked as to whether the incorporation of certain modifications of salaries in this bill would prevent the consideration of the classification bills, and it was announced and distinctly understood that these classification bills would, in due time, come before the committee and would be acted upon and reported to the House. The committee have no desire to smother any of these measures, and for one I want to say that while I am not in the habit here of getting up and talking of the poor boys in blue who carry the mails, or the poor boys who go out on the postal cars as railway mail clerks, or the other poor boys who stand in the post-offices as post-office clerks, while I am not in the habit of trying to make a little cheap claptrap effort to get the support of these post-office employees for myself in my district, I do not yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] or to any other member upon the floor of this House in my desire to see every employee of this Government paid a fair living salary; but on the other hand——

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption there?

Mr. BROMWELL. Excuse me just a minute. When a proposition is made, in violation of the rule of this House, to introduce amendments to this bill which are known to be contrary to the rule, and which the gentlemen who propose them know some member will make a point of order against, it seems to me it is an absolute waste of the time of this House to make them. The Post-Office Committee will, in due time, bring in proper reclassification bills for the consideration of this House, and I for one am ready and willing at any time to take up these bills and act upon them promptly and get them here, if possible, during this session.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

Mr. GROUT. Do you give the assurance of the committee that this bill shall have a hearing?

Mr. BROMWELL. I can give only my personal assurance that I am ready and willing at any time, as a member of that committee, to give a hearing to the substitute carriers, to the regular carriers, to the clerks of the Railway Mail Service, or to any other portion of the public service that wants to be heard upon the bills before that committee, and I am not only willing that they shall be heard, but I am willing faithfully, honestly, and conscientiously, as a member of that committee, to say that if their compensation should be increased, the committee ought to report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. GROUT. This is a proposition to fix compensation, not to increase compensation.

Mr. BROMWELL. All this talk about sympathy for these employees is, it seems to me, entirely wasted. It is just a question of business. If they are not as well paid as they ought to be, it is our duty to bring in a bill to increase their compensation. If they are as well paid for the service they render as they ought to be, then we ought to stand honestly up in behalf of the country and our constituents and say so.

From my personal standpoint, I think the substitute carriers are not paid enough; I think the regular carriers, perhaps, are not paid enough; and I want to say frankly that if I had it in my power, I would increase the pay of the railway mail clerks, who, of all other classes of Government employees, are the ones most entitled to our consideration, because every time they go aboard a train to fulfill their duties they take their lives in their hands.

Now, so far as these increases are concerned, it seems to me that it is a question that ought to be taken up in separate legislation, and not upon this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I realize the difficulty in the way of increasing salaries of all the Post Office employees. I realize the difficulties under which the Committee on Post-Offices labors in connection with these bills. But a moment ago the chairman of the committee himself introduced an amendment, which was adopted by this committee, though subject to a point of order, on identically the same lines as this present amendment in reference to substitute letter carriers.

The amendment so introduced and adopted by this committee was that postmasters may be permitted to employ extra labor at 25 cents per hour. I do not know whether that will do away with some of the present conditions in reference to substitute letter carriers; but, I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a shame for this Congress and this Government to expect men to work as they now do on the letter-carrier force for two or three years at the rate of $15 to $20 per month, buying their own uniforms, and at the end of that time, if they are so lucky as to be appointed letter carriers, or at the end of twenty or thirty years' service receive only a thousand dollars per year.

How do gentlemen expect that letter carriers can be maintained honest in their opinions and actions working for $20 per month? In the city of Chicago I have ascertained that the substitute letter carriers obtain from $15 to $25 per month on an average. I instantly asked the question when this information was brought to me, "Why is it necessary to have so many substitute carriers; why should there not be a fewer number and let them employ their time more, so as to be paid better?" And I learned that it was necessary to have a large number of substitute carriers, in order to carry on business at particular times; that they could not do with a smaller number; and yet we expect these men to work for this small pittance, in uniforms purchased by themselves, at $20 a month.

Unless the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee in reference to permitting postmasters to employ labor temporarily at 25 cents an hour will do away with the present evil, I appeal to him not to insist upon the point of order to this amendment, his own amendment having been subject to a point of order; but to permit these men to receive $600 a year after the first year of service. In all justice it ought to be done. I appreciate the fact that the committee in the past have endeavored to remove the low salaries of post-office clerks of four or five hundred dollars per year. Let them now remove this low salary.

It is idle nonsense to talk about a bill coming out of that committee and being passed in this Congress on this subject. I make no reflection upon the committee. They have the railway mail clerks, they have the letter carriers, they have the post-office clerks, all of them demanding increases of salaries or a reclassification. All these bills will not be considered in this House during this Congress. It is time now to do a little justice to these men who are working for practically nothing; and I hope the House may be permitted to vote upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I heartily support the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan as to substitute letter carriers. I was very sorry, indeed, to hear my friend from Massachusetts refer to this House as hypocritical. This House is not hypocritical, Mr. Chairman. This is an honest House; and if you will give the House a chance to vote upon the letter carriers' bill, it will demonstrate to you the fact it is an honest House. It will do justice to the letter carriers if you will give it the opportunity.

In relation to what was said concerning the request of John Parsons for a hearing before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I say there is no man in the United States who can make such a request with more propriety than John Parsons. He was president of the Letter Carriers' Association for many years, and is now no longer a letter carrier. Orders issued from the Post-Office Department forbid any letter carrier from coming to the House of Representatives and importuning the committee, or even the Congressman who represents him, for a hearing upon this or any other question. They are forbidden to do so by the dictum of the Department. They are forbidden to make their appearance here even when on their thirty days' leave of absence. How are they going to be heard except by proxy, and what better proxy could they have than John Parsons?

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Do you say that there is a rule of the Department which prohibits these people from petitioning the lawmakers for a redress of grievances?

Mr. CUMMINGS. There is a rule of the Department which prevents them appearing here in the Capitol to seek legislative aid.

Mr. GAINES. That is in face of the Bill of Rights, which gives them the right to petition or remonstrate with the powers that be.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They are prevented from appearing before the committee in charge of their bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Department has issued an order forbidding letter carriers——

Mr. CUMMINGS. You understand me to say exactly that thing.

Mr. MANN. To make appeals to members of Congress or to the committee?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the gentleman call attention to the order, because certainly it is not enforced in the West.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman says it is not enforced in the West. Congress meets in Washington, and not in the West.

Mr. MANN. It is not enforced as to post-office employees in the West.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Have you had post-office employees here in Washington importuning you to interfere on their behalf?

Mr. MANN. I have had post-office employees who talked with me in reference to this—I will not say importuned.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, keep their names a secret or they will lose their places. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They will not lose their places, and their names are not secret; they are known to the postmaster at Chicago.

Mr. CUMMINGS. These orders came from the Post-Office Department in Washington; they were made under an alleged Democratic Administration and are continued under a Republican Administration. As I said before, this House is not hypocritical; it will pass the bill if you give it an opportunity to do it; but for eight years it has been withheld from the House by the operation of the Reed rules, although twice reported to the House, the first time by Mr. Dunphy, of New York, and the second time by the Hon. N. D. SPERRY, of Connecticut.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. TALBERT was recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has been recognized.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, in considering this appropriation bill for the support of the Post-Office Department, however large it may be, we must admit that it is more general in its application than many others which have been made by this Congress, and I have sat here and listened very patiently to appeal after appeal in the interests of those who are employed by the Government of the United States not only in this Department, but in all the others. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made an earnest appeal, almost with tears in his eyes, a while ago to raise the salaries of the letter carriers in the large cities and towns, and he says it is a pity that they should be in the employ of the Government for twenty years and then at the end of the twenty years draw the same salary they did at the start, yet you rarely ever hear of one of them resigning, nor is it often the case in any of the departments of the Government. They hold on eternally, still crying for more pay, never satisfied, like unto the horse leach.

Why, my friend, here are Congressmen, some of whom have been here for forty years, like my friend from Illinois, Mr. CANNON, and is it a pity that he is getting no more than $5,000 a year now or ought his pay to be increased? I say no. Now, my friend, I want to say that these men in the employ of the Government, all of them from the President of the United States down to the humblest employee of the Government, are the best paid people in the world, and yet they are all crying out for an increase of salary, with but a few exceptions. Why, it seems to me there is nobody upon the floor here except the representatives of the tax consumers, and they push their claims earnestly. I want to ask this question in all candor, Has nobody a representative upon this floor except the office holder and Government employee? Have we all been elected here to advocate the claims of the salaried class? Important query and more important the answer. Let us see if we can not find some Representative here who will stand up and represent the taxpayers, the men who have to pay these enormous sums; am I to stand alone in this case as in pension frauds? I hope not.

I want to find some man who will stand up here and represent the men who follow the plow down in the cotton rows and the cornfields of the South. [Applause.] I want to find some man who will stand up here and represent the men who raise wheat and corn in the West, and I want to find some representative, some man on this floor, who will represent the blacksmith at the forge, the laborers in the factory, the men in the coal mines and iron mines, and the carpenter at the bench, as well as the tax consumers and the tax eaters—the salaried class—who are all getting more than they ought to now when you consider the ability of the taxpayer to meet these enormous demands. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have never yet known a warrant to be issued to force a man into the Government service, where you say he has to work so hard and gets so little pay for his service. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, sir, no corporation or business institution in the world can afford to pay such salaries as is paid by this great Government to its employees with so many privileges and so little labor.

No, sir; there are always nine more standing at the door trying to get in for every one already in; there are hundreds and thousands of them outside anxious and eager to get in where these men are serving such a laborious term of service for so little wages. Go to the Departments of this Government to-day and you will find them running over each other, in each other's way, and if you want to do some service to the taxpayers, introduce a bill that would turn out one-third and make the other two-thirds do the work, and then you can reduce the expenses, and maybe raise the salaries a little bit, but in the name of conscience stop this indecent haste in increasing salaries where in many instances they are already too high.

I want to say that I have no general criticism to make of the bill that has been brought in by the Post-Office Committee, except as to one or two items in connection with amounts to be paid railroads, and one or two others. I believe it is just, I believe it is right, because it is a service rendered all the people. Fourteen millions seems to be a large sum for free delivery in cities and towns; but when you extend the same privilege to the people in the country I make no objection. I took the position in the Fifty-third Congress that the people in the country had as much right to free delivery of mail as the people in the cities, for they are the bone and sinew of the country. I then began a war to that end, and, with others in the House, notably Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi and Mr. Moses, of Georgia, succeeded in that Congress in getting an appropriation of $20,000 for free delivery in the country to the men who work on the farms and in the workshops, in the fields and at the forge, and this was the beginning of the free rural delivery of any practical kind, which has already resulted in disseminating knowledge into the backwoods of the country home.

Since that time it has been increased by persistent effort, from Congress to Congress, to $100,000, then to $150,000, and then to $300,000, and in this bill they have increased it to $1,750,000. I favored and worked for each increase. I am willing to make it $250,000 more, or $2,000,000, to help the taxpayers a little—that class of people who seem to have no one to speak for them upon this floor, while so many are ready to speak for the tax eaters. Stand up here and advocate something in the interest of these taxpayers, and show by your legislation here that you recognize these farmers and laborers, which you only do now when the tax assessor and collector goes around. They seem now to be only recognized by the assessor and collector. You divide the country into two classes by your class legislation here, to be known as the skinner and the skinned. [Laughter.]

You are all standing to-day, it seems, upon the side of the skinner, and I want to see somebody say something in the interest of the skinned. [Laughter and applause.] I am one of the skinned myself, and of course I will dare to advocate their cause. I want to see somebody represent here the rights of the people who are being skinned, because it seems they have no one yet to represent them here while such lavish appropriations are going on. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks along this line. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness—for I am in earnest about this matter—I said a few days ago, in submitting some remarks upon the Army appropriation bill, that we were face to face with an age or period of extravagant appropriations. I repeat it now. It is a plain fact. It is necessary that appropriations should be made, and sometimes very large ones; but it is never necessary, sir, to make extravagant ones. It is necessary to appropriate sums of money sufficient to defray the expenses of government economically administered, but whenever you take one single dollar from the pockets of the people more than is actually necessary to run the Government on a basis of economy, it is robbery pure and simple, nothing more, nothing less.

It does seem to me that this Congress has forgotten the fact that there are taxpayers as well as tax consumers, as I said in the opening remarks upon this bill, and I will say again that it seems to me that there is a conspiracy, so to speak, amongst members here to raid the Treasury in the interest of the tax consumers as against the taxpayers. We have heard a good deal about billion-dollar Congresses, and we have had them, but now we will soon begin to hear about billion-dollar sessions of Congress. In view of this fact should we not stop and reflect? Think of it, a billion dollars spent in only one session of Congress, making $2,000,000,000 for the Congress! Do you forget that every dollar of this enormous amount must come out of the pockets of the people before it can be appropriated? Look over the different appropriation bills that have been passed during this session and those yet to come and add the amounts together, if you please, and ponder a moment and see whither you are drifting if not toward bankruptcy and ruin.

I am not opposed to appropriating every dollar that is necessary to defray the expenses of the Government, but in the name of common sense let us be reasonable in these things.

I know that such talk falls upon deaf ears, but sooner or later you must call a halt. Several urgent deficiency bills have already been passed, amounting to over $10,000,000. The pension appropriation bill amounted to $150,000,000; the Indian appropriation to over nine millions; the diplomatic and consular appropriation to some seven or eight millions; the agricultural to some five millions; the legislative, judicial, and executive to some forty or fifty millions; the fortification bill to ten or fifteen millions; the Army appropriation bill to one hundred and twenty-five millions; the naval appropriation to some sixty or seventy millions; then the Post-Office appropriation, now under consideration, will run up to one hundred and twelve or one hundred and fifteen millions; then follows the sundry civil appropriation bill, amounting to anywhere from fifty to one hundred millions; and finally, the general deficiency, running up toward sixty or one hundred millions more. Then comes the ship-subsidy bill and Nicaragua Canal, amounting to millions more. So that in all we will get very nigh on to one billion for the session.

Then the President every now and then appoints a commission to draw thousands from the Treasury to do nothing but roam over the country and frolic. What has called for all these increased appropriations? Why, the Government of the United States is now in the hands of men who were placed in power by organized wealth, a combination of trusts, corporations, and monopolies, and now in turn they must be rewarded for services. Relentless and remorseless greed is enthroned in this great country of ours. The speculative and exploiting classes, backed up by the money power, have begun to place laws upon the statute books by which they may be enabled to rob and plunder the great mass of the people under the pretended need of taxation. The war with Spain, adroitly brought on by this very class, has given them a splendid opportunity to carry out their hellish designs, which they are using to overthrow our free democratic institutions and establish instead a despotism of corporate greed and wealth.

By this means they hope to establish an empire upon the ruins of this Republic which will enable them, under the pretended head of vast appropriations, to plunder both the people at home and those abroad, backed up by an immense navy on sea and a great standing army on land. They attempt to deceive the people by a simple prattle about our foreign trade. When you hear so much about foreign trade consult the trade statistics of every country in the world and you will find that the domestic trade and commerce of the United States greatly exceed that of all the nations of Europe combined. Then why not develop the resources at home, and build up our home industries, and let our foreign trade take care of itself and stand upon its merits in the future as it has done in the past? Our foreign trade will grow and expand in spite of all things else. So let it take care of itself, which it will do, and no nation will outdo our nation in that respect.

When you hear so much about the rich lands coveted in far-off islands, let your minds turn to our own Mississippi Valley, the garden of the West, so to speak, and then remember that those who see prizes in little spots scattered over two oceans under tropical suns are not likely to overlook the riches at home, of which their coffers have been filled and from which they are being constantly replenished. Anything now in order to put through Congress large appropriations pretendingly to build up our foreign trade, when really it means the march toward imperialism and the worst kind of miltarism, and from that to monarchy and ruin, despair and desolation. Let us develop our own country—North, South, East, and West.

I herewith insert a clipping from the National Watchman of recent issue, which is significant in itself. Let us study the sentiment there expressed and profit by it:

What attraction would the prizes of foreign conquest offer to the money kings, railroad barons, and trust magnates of the United States if, in order to acquire them, they would be forced to surrender their monopolies at home? None whatever. It is true that a small but exceedingly rich and powerful band of Americans have formed a copartnership with a small band of English capitalists for the purpose of building railroads in China, and that these men are goaded on by the alluring promise of gain, approximating a round billion of dollars by exploiting the Flowery Kingdom and putting labor-saving machinery into the hands of its teeming millions of efficient and docile laborers.

It is true that this power induced President McKinley to purchase the Philippine Islands and inaugurate a war of conquest in order that the naval and military forces of the United States might have occupation in Asiatic waters at a convenient distance from China, so that they might be used in connection with those of Great Britain to bully the Chinese Government and bluff European competitors. But it is also true that the small band of exploiters known as the American wing of the Anglo-American China Development Company could not hope to carry out their scheme of overthrowing the American Republic and erecting an empire upon its ruins without the aid of the confederated banks, railroads, and trusts, who see in the transition from republic to empire a pretext to strengthen the military arm of the Government and to have at the disposal of their servant in power a military force that can be used, when the occasion arises, to set aside a verdict at the ballot box adverse to their interests in order to retain possession of the government at home and to perpetuate their rule of plunder.

The country is now face to face with the new issues of imperialism and militarism. Hannaism boldly challenges the intelligence and patriotism of our people. The Republican party of Lincoln and Seward and Chase and Grant is no more. It was strangled at St. Louis in 1896 by Hanna and the monopolies, who arrayed themselves in the graveclothes of their honored predecessors and then, in a campaign of lying, deception, and through the brutal use of money, secured the election of McKinley.

The mask is now off. Deception is no longer possible if Democrats will arouse themselves to action and expose the purposes of the enemies of the Republic to the light of public discussion. It is openly proposed by the Hannaites to overthrow the Republic and erect an empire upon its ruins. The Declaration of Independence is publicly scoffed at by them, and the Constitution, the great charter of our liberties, is being spurned with contempt. The Administration at Washington knows no law, no Constitution, nothing but the will of the money kings and the monopolies.

For the first time in our history organized wealth is in absolute possession of the machinery of the Government. They hold one of the great political organizations firmly within their grasp, while the other is yet in the hands of the people. Organized greed has millions to purchase votes, but if the Democrats do their duty the Hannaites will receive but few votes in the next election that they do not pay for with cash or secure through corrupting men with patronage and office. They are powerless with all their millions and with all the offices at their disposal to carry the election if the loyal Democrats in every neighborhood accept the challenge that is now thrown down to them, organize their forces, and commence at once the work of the campaign.

The mask is now thrown off, as stated in this article, and the party in power boldly proclaimed by their votes upon the Porto Rican bill that they intend to continue the march to imperialism and colonial government. For a long time they hypocritically pretended they were in favor of bimetallism, but in the passage of the gold-standard bill through Congress they boldly proclaim they are opposed to bimetallism and intend to set up the golden calf and fall down and worship it. Thus, step by step, are they fastening the chains of slavery upon the great mass of the people of this country. Instead of fighting trusts and monopolies, they are boastingly upholding them and going forward in a way to breed from day to day more and more of them to destroy the interest of the toiling masses.

This war now going on in the Philippines is an Administration-made machine, and I believe is being carried on for purposes other than patriotic, as I have already stated. The President and the majority party in Congress must realize that they have it in their power to bring about peaceful conditions in the Philippines by pledging the Filipinos their independence and the right to organize their own government. There is no doubt in my mind that such a promise would immediately bring hostilities to an end and restore peace and prosperity. But no; that is not what they want. That will not serve their purpose. They seem to prefer murder and brigandage under the pretended head of protecting the nation's honor. Hypocrites, scribes, and pharisees they are and, like whited sepulchers, full of dead men's bones within, though white outside. Shame upon such people and upon such infamous policies!

Why do I say that the Republican party are playing the hypocrite? Because they declare one thing and do another. They are so effectively under the control of the trusts they make hypocritical declarations upon the subject and attempt to deceive the people by pretending to oppose them, while all the time working in their interest. They professed opposition to a gold standard while at the same time working for its establishment. These facts reveal the hypocrisy of the party and demonstrate further that no confidence can be placed in its professions. And now in the State conventions it is amusing to hear them denouncing trusts, suggesting strongly Satan rebuking sin to deceive the unwary. The devil may continue to quote scripture if he likes, but his antics are known to the people, and they will not be deceived, and sooner or later they will rise in the power of their righteous indignation and sweep them from power.

Amongst other expenses and extravagances, I will call attention to one in particular. Let us consult for a moment our enormous outlay for pensions. As we are now still paying pensions to widows and daughters of the soldiers in the Revolutionary war, or over one hundred and twenty years after peace with Great Britain, is it not possible that we will be paying pensions on account of the civil war over one hundred years from now? As things are now running five or six billions will be a conservative estimate in the next fifty years. To this add the sum already expended of near three billions, and we have eight billions. Then to this add for the next fifty years what might be a fair estimate, and you have an enormous sum, far exceeding three or four times the entire cost of the civil war. Then to all this must be added the casualties of the Spanish-American war.

Our last appropriation for pensions was $150,000,000. Let us compare this outlay with other countries for like purposes. England has a standing army of over 200,000, to say nothing of her immense navy of possibly more than 100,000. She has been embroiled in wars, small and great, for the last fifty years, and she is the richest creditor nation of the world. Yet her estimates for pensions rarely ever reach over six millions, being about one twenty-fifth of those of the United States. There must be some reason for this. Great Britain does not pay pensions to men or widows who are rich. The United States does. The rich in England, disabled in their country's defense, get, maybe, a medal of some kind as a token of regard for such service. Here it is different. Rich men here get pocket money as pensioners.

And here let me say that both parties are responsible for these pension enormities, because both parties are attempting to raid the Treasury in order to electioneer with the old soldier.

If the pension list of the United States could only be published it would show many instances where men in receipt of large salaries are also drawing pensions for total disability. I believe it would show instances where men drawing pensions for total blindness are earning a living as night watchmen. I believe it would show instances where men drawing pensions for total deafness are earning a living by running telephone lines. It would show instances where men are drawing pensions and yet getting $5,000 salary as Congressmen. It would show thousands of cases where men are getting good salaries and yet drawing a good sum as pensioners. It would show that many soldiers cared for in the National Soldiers' Homes are drawing pensions also and asking for an increase, while many are real-estate agents and engaged in other lines of business, while being fed, clothed, and housed by the Government, yet hoarding money for themselves.

I have been told that a chief justice of a Southwestern State is drawing a pension of $72 a month with a salary of $4,000 a year. It is notoriously true that our pension list costs us more annually than the standing army of every country except Russia, whose army costs something over $175,000,000. Our Government pays more for pensions by $35,000,000 than the army of Germany costs. We pay more for pensions yearly by $28,000,000 than the French army costs. Now, mind you, this estimate is only as to the cost of European armies, to say nothing of their pensions. If you add to our pension cost the cost of our Army and Navy as it now stands, with all the expenses of our military and naval establishments, we bear the heaviest military burden of any people in the world. Already there are over 30,000 applications for pensions from soldiers of the Spanish-American war. I ask, then, as I said in the outset, is it not time to stop and reflect a moment or two, even long enough to ask who pays the fiddler while so many dance?

Relating to the Spanish-American war, I desire to insert a clipping from the Manila American which will explain itself:

"GET A PENSION."

Under the above caption, printed in deep black type among the reading advertisements of the Manila American, appears the following appeal by an American pension-claim agent to the soldiers and sailors now serving in the Philippines:

"Soldiers and sailors of the Spanish war and soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy or their heirs, do you want a pension? If so, write for question blank and circulars to Charles J. Alden, 291 Grand avenue, Milwaukee, Wis. He is the most successful pension-claim agent in the United States. He has had twenty years' experience and has prosecuted thousands of pension claims to a successful issue. Mr. Alden was formerly a member of Company H, Twenty-first Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and was three years in the service, and his sympathies are with the boys who wear the blue."

It is this "get a pension" outcry which has so disgusted the people of all sections with the pension-attorney business. It has caused such a prostitution of patriotism that many men are led to believe that the pension is the first consideration of military service. Aside from its immediate effect of swelling the roll of applicants with unworthy claimants and eventually adding many undeserving men to the bounty list, it debases the spirit of the people. It reduces enlistment to the plane of an investment. It may be safely taken for granted that the men who really suffer and thereby earn rewards and sustenance from the Republic will find their rights without the intervention of these drummers, whose announcements, whether honestly meant or not, only too plainly suggest that no soldier or sailor need hesitate to believe that by hook or crook, whether deserving or not, he can—with the aid of a fee—"get a pension."

Now, here's a pretty kettle of fish, is it not? Gentlemen of the House, think of this!

You see by the tendency of this just which way the wind blows all the time. The cry is, "Get a pension! Then get it increased. If you fail at the Bureau, come to Congress and get a special bill." Who is to pay these bills? Why, the people. Then is it not right that somebody should say a word in their behalf? I will, for one, speak a word for the taxpayer, though the heavens fall. Various remedies may be suggested for reforming this evil. I believe it would be a good idea to publish a list of all the pensioners, so that the world could see the enormity for themselves. I believe it would be a good idea to do away entirely with pension attorneys and provide by law that no one having adequate means of support should have a pension except for the loss of limb, eyesight, or general physical deformity from active service.

I believe also that young women who marry aged pensioners only to get a pension at their death, and who were not sharers in their hardships while soldiers, should not be allowed pensions. And then I believe that the pension laws of the nation are sufficiently liberal to enable every person who deserves a pension to get it under the general laws, and hence I believe that all private pension legislation ought to be prohibited, except in a few extreme cases, where relief ought to be granted. With these views I want to say that I am in favor of every true, patriotic soldier who stood by the flag of his country drawing a proper, reasonable pension when he has received disabilities in the service of the same, and his widow after him; and, too, I believe the private soldier and his widow and children deserve as much consideration as the officer and his widow and children. The private soldier has always borne the heat and burden of the day, being always pushed to the front, while many a time the officer was in a bombproof position. How the simple, heroic, disinterested patriotism of the private soldier eclipses the laurels of a mere conqueror!

Now, sir, a word as to private pension legislation. I have taken the ground here that such legislation ought to be done with a quorum, as required by law. Carrying out that idea, I have, by insisting on a quorum from night to night, forced the House to abandon Friday night sessions. I believed I was right then; I believe so now. Then, in the consideration of these claims in the House, I further insist that the report accompanying each bill ought to be read before voting. For these positions I have been severely criticised, but am glad that I have testimonials here that I am upheld by the press of the country, both Republican and Democratic. Also, I have many letters from old soldiers themselves indorsing me in my course upon this question.

I insert here an editorial from the Washington Star of April 14:

A CHECK TO HASTY PENSION LEGISLATION.

The House resolved itself for several hours yesterday into a court of pension appeals, and passed fifty-four private pension bills. The occasion was edifying beyond the mere spectacle of the interruption of the legislative process in order that the laws might be ignored. It showed that if this proceeding is really necessary it can be made at least regular in its course. Mr. TALBERT, of South Carolina, deserves credit for instituting an important reform in this process. He has drawn upon himself the attacks of the special pension legislators by his persistent demands for a quorum whenever the House considers this class of bills.

He has even been threatened with expulsion from the House on a partisan vote in the next Congress under pretense of a contest, if he should be returned and the House should be Republican. His offense consists in demanding that the House observe the rules of order, that it understand the bills it passes, that it guard this highest privilege of special pension legislation as jealously as it guards any other feature of its work. For this service Mr. TALBERT is entitled to the thanks not only of those who have no special interest in the pension laws and their proper administration, yet are concerned for the best interests of good government, but of those who are personally friendly to the pension system. For every private bill hastily passed, bearing a taint of suspicion as to its worth, is a reproach to the entire system. It is another bid for popular indignation, another item in the long account which is rolling up against the abuse of a great national charity.

The friends of honest pension legislation should never demur at the demand that the House study these bills. Nor should there be objection to the expenditure of time involved in a careful consideration of each measure, not alone in committee, but in the House itself. An attempt was made yesterday to bring Mr. TALBERT into ridicule by calculating the cost of the time consumed as a result of his opposition to heedless legislation. The House and Senate must come finally to see that this business of violating the statutes in behalf of particular claimants is worthy the exercise of the greatest caution. When Congress steps beyond the bounds of law and administers charity out of pure sentiment, as yesterday to the helpless child of a soldier, who can not possibly be pensioned under the laws as they read, the situation calls for deliberation.

Once the gates are opened there is no checking the flood of these bills. Nor is it wise to rely too implicitly upon the committees. Too often these bodies are able to give the cases only perfunctory examination and the bills are pressed through at the instance of members who have been prodded by constituents to the point of demanding such favors.

To prate about the waste of valuable time does not square with the doleful waste of which members are guilty every day in the delivery of long-winded speeches, designed solely for the benefit of susceptible voters in the campaigns. The course of honesty and good government calls for even a greater waste of time over such matters, which require the keenest judgment of which a legislator is capable, regardless of his sympathies or his partisan fears.

This article speaks for itself. It is from an influential paper published in Washington City, and reflects the sentiment of the thinking public right under the nose of more pensioners and pension agents than anywhere else.

Following this I will insert an editorial from the Springfield Republican of the 18th of April, which will speak for itself, and comes from the great State of Massachusetts.

In addition to these testimonials of approval, I have many letters from old soldiers commending my course, but for the present I will content myself with inserting the newspaper clippings, though I have the letters here in my desk for any one to see who wishes to do so.

TALBERT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

A Congressman from South Carolina, Mr. TALBERT, has drawn upon himself the fury of those fellow-members who are interested in the passage of special pension bills at the rate of 50 or 100 an afternoon. He has even been threatened with expulsion from the House in the next Congress, it is said, under pretense of a contest for his seat. He must be a highly objectionable fellow to have incurred such unpopularity. On second thought, however, the country may decide that he is a national benefactor.

The magnitude of Mr. TALBERT's offending can be studied in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD's report of the session of Friday last, when the Committee of the Whole took up the consideration of private pension bills. On January 19 the House had passed the general pension appropriation bill, carrying $145,215,250, but that was to meet the demands only of those who receive pensions under the laws of the United States, which, it is needless to say, are the loosest and most liberal known in the history of mankind. On Friday last the House turned its attention to those individuals whose cases are not, for the most part, provided for by the pension laws and which call for special legislation by Congress. When the first bill on the Calendar had been called Mr. TALBERT, of South Carolina, said:

* * * I think, in consideration of claims from Committees on Pensions, the reports accompanying the bill in every case ought to be read, so that the House can vote intelligently upon the claims at issue. I do not believe that these bills ought to be poured like corn into a hopper and run through without any consideration, without any criticism, and without any scrutiny. I shall, therefore, ask in every case that the report accompanying the bill be read. I hope the report accompanying the bill which has just been reported will be read in the hearing of the House. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, and it appeared that the claimant for a special pension was the sick and destitute daughter of a Wisconsin soldier of the civil war, the daughter having received a pension until she was 16 years old, when it ceased under the law. Since then she had become unable to earn her living, but she now had no possible pensionable status. Whether the United States Government should help to support such unfortunate persons is a question upon which people may differ. Mr. TALBERT, of South Carolina, had merely demanded, however, to be made acquainted with the circumstances of the case before voting upon it. The bill went through.

Whenever a bill was read Mr. TALBERT asked that the accompanying committee report be read also. This reading of reports soon became very exasperating to many of the members present, because it "delayed business" and threatened to diminish very considerably the number of bills that could be rushed through that afternoon. None of these special bills get rejected, it would seem, if they once come before the House with the indorsement of the committee. It is in the interest, therefore, of every member who desires to secure the passage of a special pension neither to offer objection nor to cause delay when another member's bill is before the House.

The operation thus becomes the "You tickle me and I'll tickle you" in statesmanship. The trouble with Mr. TALBERT, of South Carolina, was that he was not in the tickling business. Before long, the patriotic General SHATTUC, of Ohio, arose and said that opposition to pensions came with ill grace from a former Confederate soldier. Then Mr. NORTON of Ohio delivered an eloquent speech, "In the name of God and humanity," against TALBERT. "I would be glad," said the impassioned NORTON, "if I could arouse you to a higher patriotism." But TALBERT doggedly insisted on asking for the committee's reports. He explained his position, in answer to Mr. LAMB, of Virginia:

"Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, I have no little petty claims to beg anybody for, or to ask any assistance to secure their passage. You are sitting here, and this man is sitting here, with these little petty claims that you are anxious to get through, and you will vote for almost anything in order to get that little infernal claim of your own through. [Laughter.] * * * This whole thing looks like a mere matter of 'logrolling,' each member voting to help the other, and all of them ready to use the taxing power of the Government in order to put pension claims through Congress, many of which, as I have said, I do not believe to be meritorious or have any warrant in law. I am absolutely opposed to it."

Some one admitted that he thought TALBERT was at least "honest and candid," whereupon Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan, said he did not believe it. "I think," said the Michigander, "that TALBERT is a bitter enemy of the old soldier." And so the assault went on.

But as the bills kept coming up the irrepressible TALBERT continued to ask for the reading of the reports explaining the cases. Finally he became so much of a nuisance that the special pension party began to object whenever he asked for the reading. Under the rules an objection practically shuts out the report. At this point Mr. UNDERWOOD belatedly came to Mr. TALBERT's aid, and declared that "when a member stands in his place and desires a report to be read for the information of himself and members, it is as reprehensible to deny him that privilege as any filibustering tactics that can be pursued on either side."

Mr. TALBERT now wearied of the single-handed struggle, and bill after bill went through without a word of explanation or discussion. The work of the South Carolina member, however, had had some effect. The House, in Committee of the Whole, succeeded that afternoon in grinding through the hopper only 53 special pension bills, as compared with over 90 on a previous Friday afternoon.

Mr. TALBERT should hang on. He is as much of a patriot as any one in the House, and in fighting the manifest abuses of special pension legislation he is performing a real public service. It is unfortunate that there is only one of him in Congress.

Here are two editorials from two Pittsburg papers, one Democratic and the other Republican:

[From the Pittsburg Dispatch.]

THE HIGH STANDARD.

Representative JASPER TALBERT, who has stood manfully in the House at Washington against the unconstitutional injustice of passing bills without a quorum voting, keeps in close touch with public sentiment. He knows he is right, and he appreciates being upheld by the press.

Defending his stand on this matter the other day, he declared nearly all the big newspapers held the same view of the subject as himself, his desk being filled with clippings to prove his assertion. One of these, from the Dispatch, he had read with the comment: "Now, Mr. Chairman, the Dispatch is an influential and responsible newspaper, and you Republicans know that what it says is gospel truth, and you can not get away from it."

Mr. TALBERT knows a good newspaper when he sees one, quite as well as he knows right from wrong. The need of Congress is to have more men who will be equally conscientious in having each piece of legislation thoroughly scrutinized and passed only when a full constitutional majority attends to the duty of voting for it.

[From the Pittsburg Post.]

MORE PENSION ABUSES.

Nine Americans out of ten concede the abuses and profligate extravagance of our pension system, but whenever an attempt is made to reform it a plea goes out for the "old soldiers." There never was a question of conceding the most complete and liberal pension system to those who are fairly entitled to pensions. Any opposition that shows itself is to abuses of the system and the granting of pensions to those not entitled to them.

The best evidence of this is that the pension bill of the Government to-day amounts to nearly $150,000,000 a year, which is more than is spent by any European government for military purposes and pensions in time of peace. No such liberal system in the way of pensions has ever existed in the history of the world as the one in force in the United States. And yet the pension claimants, who as a matter of fact are the claim agents, many of whom have become millionaires by their share of the bounty to the old soldiers, are not content, and puzzle their ingenuity at every session of Congress in devising new schemes of pension outlay.

There was a sensational scene in the House of Representatives on Friday because of the opposition manifested to the rushing of special pension bills through by a few members in the absence of a quorum, and of course the usual nonsense about denying the old soldiers their just dues. These special pension laws are the worst abuse of the system. They take up and allow the claims that have been rejected by the Pension Bureau under our liberal laws. These claims have no standing under the general laws. Therefore they are whirled through Congress by the score and by the hundred in as many minutes, without proper examination or debate and with few members present. It is generally done by the log rolling plan of "you vote for my bill and I will vote for yours."

A conscientious member who objects to this procedure and insists on a quorum being present to vote on the bills is denounced as animated by the worst motives, as being ungrateful, and with no appreciation of the services of the veterans. Correctly put, this opposition should be rated as opposition to jobbery and the granting of pensions to those who have no just claim. "JOE" SIBLEY, in the spirit of unmitigated demagogism, took part in Friday's debate, claiming that opposition to these special pension bills cost the Government more than the granting of them. Of course this was a manifest falsehood, but it answered SIBLEY's purpose. Reduced to its proper proportions, it meant that all sorts of jobbing should go through Congress because they may cause debate, and the debating, counting the wages of Congressmen, who are paid by the year, costs more than the proposed grabs. This is getting down to the emptyings in the way of pension demagogism.

This shows that both the Republican and Democratic press are sustaining me in my position. These are from the North, and I will insert an editorial from the Savannah News as a sample from the South, of which I have a great many, considering it unnecessary to publish more:

TALBERT'S BRAVE FIGHT.

Representative TALBERT, of South Carolina, has called down upon his head the wrath of every member of the House who has pension jobs pending in Congress by insisting that there shall be a quorum present when pension bills are considered. He knows, and so does every other member of the House, that thousands of dollars are voted away at every session to pension claimants who are not able to show to the Commissioner of Pensions that they are entitled to pensions.

Only a few days ago that official made a public statement in which he showed that the pension attorneys succeed in getting vast sums out of the Treasury for pension applicants who are not entitled to anything from the Government.

No doubt there are some just pension claims allowed by Congress, but it is probable that the majority of them are based largely, if not wholly, on evidence that would not stand the test of a thorough investigation. These claims as a rule are approved by the House. It is the easiest thing in the world to get a pension claim through Congress. There is neither the time nor the means to investigate thoroughly the claims that are presented to that body.

Mr. TALBERT has no hostility to those who are entitled to pensions, but he has good reason to think that many of the pensions granted by Congress under the present system are based on fraudulent evidence. He is simply trying to protect the Treasury against a lot of people who have no claim on the Government. For that he is abused by some of his fellow-members—men who should hold up his hands instead of abusing him. He is seeking to do the country a service—a service that does not seem to be appreciated.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I ask if I am to stand alone in defending the taxpayers to-day from the cry of every official for increase of salary? I am opposed to all these increases in the bill. Coming back to the appropriation under consideration, I want to say that I shall vote against any further extension of the pneumatic-tube system in the cities because it can not be extended, as the free delivery of mail can, into the rural districts. I have already said that the free-delivery system in cities was right and proper because we are now extending it to the country people as well. Again, I am absolutely opposed to the $196,000 appropriation as a subsidy to the Southern Railroad and one other, because upon general principles I am opposed to subsidies and the Post-Office authorities plainly state they can get no better facilities with it than they can get without it.

Tnen, again, it is a significant fact that the railroad corporations seem to have a great many representatives upon this floor; and I want to say, without reflection upon anyone, that I honestly believe if there was a stringent law passed prohibiting any railroad from giving and any member of Congress from taking a free pass over their lines, the railroads would not get so many favors and the taxpayers would be greatly benefited. I notice whenever this appropriation is under consideration the railroad magnates—some of them—are generally around, and sometimes it has happened that a junketing trip has been taken soon after with members and their families.

Sir, you need not tell me that a human being is not a human being, and you need not tell me that a corporation does not expect a quid pro quo for everything given. So that when a man is taken, with his family and friends, and placed upon a soft cushion and carried across the continent without pay, you need not tell me there will be no influence felt. I do not pretend to charge that any member of Congress would sell himself, but I do say we are all human beings, and that this free-pass business does have great influence sometimes upon legislation; and the great mass of the people are beginning to open their eyes to this abuse, as well as other great abuses now existing, and well they should.

Summing up the great burden of taxation, let us think of a government costing about $250,000 an hour, nearly six millions a day, forty millions a week, nearly one hundred and fifty millions a month, and possibly in the neighborhood of two billions a year—and ask yourself if it does not suggest something that would cause a sigh in the interest of those who are to pay it? These conditions have been brought about by the party in power. The issues are before us. These conditions may succeed for a time, but the intelligent millions of American people have ever recognized that the party founded by Jefferson is, in the broadest and fullest sense, the true idea of government, and they recognize the Democratic party as the bulwark of constitutional and personal rights. Money kings, monopolies, and trusts are the real supporters of the Republican party. Thus all the elements destructive of liberty favor the Republican party. Against this stands the eternal truths expressed in the Declaration of Independence and government founded upon the principle of our forefathers, backed up by the Constitution and laws of the land. Standing by these principles, let us move on with a determination to preserve them in their purity or perish in the conflict. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I was on the floor trying to raise objection to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] extending his remarks in the RECORD. I want to hear him in the House. But the Chair refused to recognize me.

Mr. TALBERT. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] hardly ever says anything, I would like to hear him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES. That is one time when you have succeeded in saying something. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman frequently makes "a few remarks" before he says anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to understand that when a body of the subordinate force of the Government, numbering between thirty-five and forty thousand, array their forces and ask of the American Congress increased compensation for labor performed, they should find earnest advocates upon this floor. They have found them here to-day, have had them in the past, and will have them in the future. To that I make no demur. Under the proceedings of this House these bills have followed the same course that all legislation follows. They have received, and no doubt will receive, at the hands of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which I am a member, fair and full consideration at the proper time, and in some form, modified or changed, may or may not be reported to this House.

But it is proper that this House should know to what extent these appeals of from thirty-five to forty thousand members of this subordinate force reach in the increased compensation asked for. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] with reference to substitute letter carriers would amount annually, according to the official report upon the bill of which the amendment is a duplicate, to $246,500 as the force is now constituted, not only for the next fiscal year, but continuing for each fiscal year. And as the substitute force grows the amount of money involved will increase.

Another bill is for the classification of clerks of first and second class post-offices. The official statement of the Department is that this bill will increase their compensation $1,000,000, not only for this year, but for every year in the future.

The next bill relates to fourth-class postmasters, and makes an increase of $5,550,000. The next is a bill increasing our letter carriers, the increase amounting to $2,370,000; and if another bill submitted should be approved, one million more, making the increase on account of letter carriers $3,370,000. Then the bill providing for increase and reclassification of railway postal clerks would carry $1,400,000. In effect, the amount of increased compensation for this body of officials—less than 40,000—would be almost $12,000,000 for the next fiscal year and for every year in the future, plus the increase of force.

That these bills should receive considerate and watchful care on the part of your committee I believe every member of this House will concede. And as to the course of the chairman of this committee having these subjects under consideration in his committee, no one can question the wisdom of his course in objecting to any hasty legislation that this House may be inclined to adopt. And further, it will be conceded that he is warranted at all times in making points of order upon every proposition that is a part and parcel of this proposed annual increase of $12,000,000.

Mr. LOUD. Does the Chair desire to hear from me regarding the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DALZELL). The Chair is ready to decide the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the Chair will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, as the amendment clearly embraces new legislation.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers in new offices entitled to free-delivery service under existing law, $60,000.

The Clerk read as follows.

After the word "dollars," in line 25, page 12, add:

"Provided, That letter carriers may be required to work not exceeding forty-eight hours during the six working days of each week, and such number of hours on Sundays as may be required by the needs of the service; and if a legal holiday shall occur on any working day, the service performed on said day shall be counted as eight hours, without regard to the time actually employed. If any letter carrier is employed for a greater number of hours than forty-eight during the working days in any week, he shall be paid extra for the same in proportion to the salary fixed by law."

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I wish to inquire whether this applies to all post-offices?

Mr. LOUD. It does; and my understanding is that the letter carriers themselves have agreed that this will be an improvement in the method of managing the business of the carrier service, by reason of the fact that on some days the mail is extremely heavy and on other days quite light. This would permit the working of the carriers eight and a half or nine hours a day; but it is provided that they shall not work more than forty-eight hours during a week. The result would be, as suggested to me by many carriers, that on Saturdays, when the business in our cities is light, they would probably get the afternoon to themselves, that being a short working day of perhaps only four or five hours.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the amendment has been offered if it carries the remedy suggested by the gentleman from California. The reason I asked the question is because the amendment is made to a clause in the bill applying to letter carriers in new offices.

Mr. LOUD. My understanding is that it applies to all of the letter carriers.

I ask a vote.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental expenses, including letter boxes, package boxes, posts, furniture, satchels, straps, marine service at Detroit, Mich., 15 mechanics, to be employed exclusively in erecting and painting letter boxes in cities containing post-offices of the first-class, where they are most needed, and expenses of assistant superintendents of free-delivery service, $200,000.

Mr. LOUD. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 11, after the word "dollars," add "in all, $15,752,600: Provided, That 10 per cent of the foregoing amounts for free-delivery service may be available interchangeably for expenditure on the objects named, but no one item of appropriation shall thereby be increased more than 10 per cent."

Mr. LOUD. This is the usual item, which was left out in the preparation of the bill by an error.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For experimental rural free delivery, including pay of carriers, horse hire allowance, supplies, and mechanical appliances, $1,750,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the carriers on rural free-delivery routes shall be paid at the rate of not less than $900 per annum.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most popular branches of the postal service, and the carriers who have made it a success are entitled to the credit for that service, and yet they are paid only $400 per annum. They furnish a wagon and two horses and work from about 5 o'clock in the morning until late at night to perform the service required, during rain or shine, and I think that they are, without exception, the poorest paid of any class of employees in the service of the Government.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Except the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. CURTIS. Possibly with the exception of the fourth-class postmasters. I will make that exception.

Surely the House can not object to paying these carriers $50 a month for the valuable service rendered.

The honorable First Assistant Postmaster-General pays these carriers the following compliment:

The fidelity of carriers and their devotion to duty are most commendable. Rain or shine, they traverse their routes and perform their duties with wonderful exactness. The percentage of errors is infinitesimal.

Now, so far as the point of order is concerned, I do not think it is good against the amendment, because the salary of the carriers is not fixed by law. It is left wholly to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. GAINES. Is the gentleman alluding now to the men who are employed in the rural free-delivery service?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. And the gentleman thinks that they receive too small a compensation?

Mr. CURTIS. I do, and the amendment is to increase their compensation.

Mr. GAINES. Well, I can tell the gentleman that you can get more men, if you will advertise the fact that you want them to engage in this service throughout the rural districts, than you will have need for under any appropriation bill that you could pass here.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, you may get them in your country, but you can not in Kansas.

Mr. GAINES. Oh, well, your people are no better off in that respect than the people throughout the rest of the country. I know as a matter of fact from recent experience that there will be no trouble in getting men to undertake the service at the pay given by the Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Perhaps you may be able to get them in your part of the country, but in Kansas men can not afford to work for such small wages and furnish their own horses and wagons, and the carriers should be well paid, for they give the public good service.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the point of order, these salaries are not fixed by law, and Congress has the right to fix them; and for that reason the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the object of the committee in increasing, as they have liberally increased, the allowances for rural free delivery is to extend the system to parts of the country which have not had the advantage of it heretofore. The committee has increased the appropriation $1,450,000 for this service. Now, if out of that amount of increase—an immense lump sum—is to be taken and used for the purpose of increasing the compensation of the carriers in those sections where the free-delivery service is already established, it would of course cripple the extension of the rural free delivery in other parts of the country.

Furthermore, in spite of the opinion of my friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], in which he is, of course, absolutely sincere, as he always is, it is a matter of fact that the Department has had no trouble heretofore in getting carriers at present salaries all over the country, and in putting the service on wherever it has been deemed desirable to inaugurate it. Throughout the rural districts of the United States the farmer boy would agree to take his father's horse and wagon to carry the mail at the compensation allowed by the Department, and this compensation is by no means a scanty allowance under the circumstances, and whether it be or be not a small sum, in comparison with other Government salaries, I am not willing to use the money appropriated for the extension of the system to increase the salaries of employees where the system already exists.

And I am not willing, furthermore, Mr. Chairman, to run the risk of giving the free-delivery system a sort of black eye at its very beginning. Wait until you have it established all over this country, from the Lakes to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and then we will talk about equalizing salaries with other salaries in the Government. At present we are only too glad to get it. I hope the amendment will not be accepted by the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Does the Chair desire to hear anything on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. As the Chair understands it, under existing law there is a discretion in the Post-Office Department as to the amount of salaries to be allowed to these carriers. Should this amendment be adopted, that discretion will be taken away from the Post-Office Department, and to that extent it is a change of existing law and new legislation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD some remarks on this subject of rural free delivery and the experiment that has been tried in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. I have a similar request from my colleague [Mr. CROMER], who is compelled to be absent, and who requests ten days in which to submit some remarks on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] asks unanimous consent that his colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROMER], be allowed to print some remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill for ten days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LATIMER. I move to strike out, in line 14, on page 13, after the word "appliances," the word "one" and insert the word "two;" so that it will read "$2,000,000."

Mr. LOUD. That will make it read "$2,750,000."

Mr. GRIGGS. Does my friend desire to speak on this?

Mr. LATIMER. No; I do not care to speak on it at present.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, upon this subject I may be permitted to say that I have been the consistent friend of rural delivery ever since I have been in Congress and have had service on this committee. The amount appropriated on the last bill for this purpose was $300,000. The subcommittee of the Post-Office Committee reported to the full committee the sum of $1,000,000 for rural delivery. I went to the Post-Office Department and asked the official in charge of free rural delivery to say to me how much he could use—not how much he would use, but how much he could use—in the extension of the rural delivery service during the next fiscal year. In reply to that he said, "I can use well for the service $1,750,000 and not a cent more." The committee would have given more had the Post-Office Department agreed that they could use it for the benefit of the service?

Mr. LATIMER. Let me ask the gentleman who made that statement?

Mr. GRIGGS. I said an official of the Post-Office Department in charge of this particular service. He said to me, "We can use a million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and I do not believe we can properly use for the good of the service a cent more than that."

Mr. LATIMER. How long since that statement was made, I should like to know?

Mr. GRIGGS. Not over thirty days, when we had the bill under consideration before the committee. Now, we have given more than that. That is all they need. That is all they would use, and it seems to me it would be folly on the part of this House to force an expenditure by that Department where they say they can not expend it for the good of the service. I believe my friend will withdraw his amendment. We do not want any further row among ourselves on this subject. The gentleman and I are both interested in this thing. I hope the House will vote down the amendment if my friend does not withdraw it.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take issue with my friend from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS], who is a member of this committee and has had an opportunity to look into this subject; but I had a conversation with one of the gentlemen who had charge of this rural delivery service, and he informed me that, so far as this rural delivery was concerned, they had divided the United States into four different sections. He said they would be able to use whatever amount of money we might appropriate for this service. It would only require an additional amount of labor. They would have to employ more men, but they could organize the United States, if necessary, if you would give them enough money, and I appeal to this House that any business man in this House knows that that statement made by that official is absolutely correct. It only requires the money and the time, and they can employ men enough to organize every district in every State in the Union. I am in favor of free rural delivery. I think we ought to extend it all over this country, and extend it as rapidly as possible, so as to reach the people who need this mail service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that the Post-Office Department makes the conditions and rules in the districts where they propose to have free mail delivery so stringent as to the condition of roads that it can only be applied to a few neighborhoods?

Mr. LATIMER. I do not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it will interest the gentleman, I will give him an example. Out of the city of Louisiana, in my district, there run three of the finest gravel roads in the United States. I undertook to get the free rural mail delivery for the neighborhood immediately surrounding that town, and the man that I wrote to, a very intelligent citizen, wrote back that the reason that they could not get it was owing to the condition of the roads. Well, that surprised me so that I wrote him to ask him if these three gravel roads were not still in existence, and he said that the trouble was that the dirt roads in between the gravel roads were not good enough to have the free delivery there, so the agent said. Now, I wish to say that I do not believe there is a district in the United States that has better roads than those that I refer to.

Mr. LATIMER. I will say that if you will give the people an opportunity to have this rural free delivery, they will go to work on the roads and make good roads. All through my district there is a demand for rural free delivery, and we have a good many good roads in my district.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Any rock roads?

Mr. LATIMER. My people would go to work and make the roads good, so as to get more rural free delivery.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am in favor of free rural mail delivery, but I do not wish them to make the condition of the roads so that it only applies to a few settlements around these old cities in the East.

Mr. LATIMER. So far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that the Post-Office have been so fair in establishing their rural free delivery that any section that will go to them and ask for free rural delivery in any section of the country that is suited for it they will get it. I do not think there is any section better fitted for it than this, and I think that if the House would appropriate enough money to give the Post-Office Department the power to create their free rural delivery they would establish it all over the country. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there is some objection to this amendment, and the Post-Office Committee have been very liberal, I withdraw the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I just want to say a few words about this free-delivery system. I notice there are 41 States which have this free rural delivery system; a number of them 1. I notice that South Carolina has 21; New York, 24; Georgia, 4; Arizona, 1; Alabama, 1; Massachusetts, 11; and so on. So it would seem that if my friend's success in getting the free rural delivery system established in his State is to become at all general it would take several million dollars in order to keep it up in his State alone, if he keeps up his present advantage over other States. Now, the gentleman says it is an easy thing—that anybody who will apply can have them established. I can state to-day as a fact that there are better roads in the county in which I live and more macadamized roads than there is in any county in the State of South Carolina or perhaps in any county in the South. I have been applying for this system, and I have got one little wing of a concern. There are over 150 miles of first-class country roads in that county.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MADDOX. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. TALBERT. Have you made application?

Mr. MADDOX. I have made application for several other counties, but I have not got them, and for some reason I find South Carolina with 24 and Georgia with 4.

Mr. TALBERT. Did the gentleman apply by letter or go to the Department?

Mr. MADDOX. Massachusetts has 11 and New York 24.

Mr. TALBERT. Did the gentleman apply by letter or go in person to the Department?

Mr. MADDOX. I applied by petition, according to the instructions issued by the Department.

Mr. TALBERT. You did not go to the Department?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes; I have. And I say to members of this House that if they will examine this list as I have they will find that the rural free-delivery system was given to some favored localities; and if it is done that way, we had better stop it right now. I am in favor of something approaching a fair distribution of this matter.

Mr. CUMMINGS. In this case it seems that Georgia is the "skinned" and South Carolina the "skinnee." [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDOX. In this case, as my friend reminds me, Georgia is the "skinned" and South Carolina is the "skinnee."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The skun! [Great laughter.]

Mr. MADDOX. Now, gentlemen, there is something radically wrong about this business.

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps I can help my friend. Perhaps South Carolinians were early in making their applications for this rural free delivery. They were the very first to apply, and the appropriation was speedily exhausted. If you will look at your applications, you will find that they are pending and will be considered; but you came in after the appropriation was exhausted, and there is no question but what you will have better treatment later on.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, I will admit you——

Mr. LACEY. I say that because I have been there, and some applications were made earlier and some later on.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, when this first appropriation was made it was made for an experimental service; and it seems that we can only experiment in South Carolina, Ohio, Iowa, and Indiana, and what I asked was to experiment throughout the United States. My attention is called to some other sections. Here is Indiana with 44 and Ohio has 49. Now, what I contend is that the discretion exercised by the Department has been one of favoritism. It will be found upon investigation that four or five States have fully one-half of these routes that have been established. South Carolina lies between North Carolina and Georgia, yet this report shows there have been 1 route established in North Carolina, 4 in Georgia, and 21 in South Carolina—more than four times as many in South Carolina as in Georgia and North Carolina together. I will undertake to say that the conditions are just as favorable to experiment with this service in either Georgia or North Carolina as in South Carolina, and yet it is claimed that this discretion has been exercised wisely. This very illustration shows that it is a matter of favoritism; no discretion about it. Experimenting, you say? Yes; at the expense of my people for some favored section; and they tell us this is a wise discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to free rural mail delivery, but unless the Post-Office Department comes down from its high horse about the kind of roads it is to be carried over it will simply go to the country in spots. You take a district like that which my friend from Iowa represents, one of the richest agricultural districts in America, and there is not enough rock in it——

Mr. LACEY. You know good land makes bad roads.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is true good land does make bad roads. There is not enough limestone or gravel in his district to make a mile of road. One of the best counties in my district has very little rock and no gravel in it, and it is impossible to have a macadamized or gravel road in that county. They have fine dirt roads. You may take another county alongside of it, not so good, that has rock and gravel roads anywhere, and that would get all the free rural mail delivery.

Take central Kentucky, and nearly every generally traveled public road in that section of the State is of macadam, and under this system of distribution—according to good roads, as they say—Kentucky would get over one-half of the appropriation that is here made.

Mr. BALL. I want to say that the appropriation heretofore has been made for experiments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I want some of the experiments in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. BALL. They took those parts of the country they thought best adapted to it on account of population, and in connection with that the Department hunted the best roads so as to see whether this thing would pan out or not. Now, if we go into the general free-delivery business, why, you can go into all the districts.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. I notice from the RECORD that Kentucky only has two.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, under this good-road theory Kentucky would have more than any other State in the Union, because it has more good roads than any other State in the Union, but it has not got more good roads in proportion than the county I live in.

Mr. BALL. You did not ask for it early enough.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, I did. I asked for it early for the county I live in.

Mr. LACEY. What county does the gentleman live in? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Pike County, the greatest county west of the Mississippi River; a county that has sent out into the world more distinguished lawyers and statesmen than any other county west of the Father of Waters.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And sent out Joe Bowers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir; and Joe Bowers.

Mr. CAPRON. And CHAMP CLARK.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes, sir; and CHAMP CLARK. [Great Laughter.] In Pike County is the largest dynamite mill in the world and the largest nursery.

Mr. GRIGGS. What kind of a nursery?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, several sorts. [Laughter.] Now, what I want to insist on is that if we go into this costly experiment further of free rural mail delivery, it shall be distributed fairly, and a road that is good enough for an ordinary mail wagon to run over is good enough for a special rural free-delivery wagon to run over.

I can pick out places in the United States that are sparsely settled where they have the finest natural roads under heaven. Take a sandy country where it never rains, or where, if it does, the water is soaked up in a few minutes—take it down in southern Kansas, a fine agricultural country, and in two hours after the heaviest sort of a rainfall the road is dry, because the land is sandy; and under this system of playing favorites Kansas, certain parts of Oklahoma, certain parts of Texas, the arid part of Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado would get this free rural mail delivery, while the rich alluvial districts, like those represented by my friend from Iowa, Mr. DOLLIVER, and myself, would be absolutely shut out on the ground that we have muddy roads in the country. We do have muddy roads sometimes, but notwithstanding that this appropriation ought to be distributed fairly. [Applause.]

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, as I want to make a few general remarks upon the subject which we have discussed here this afternoon.

Now, it is very plain to me, as an old post-office man, that sooner or later we have got to take up this matter of classification.

Whether we do it this year or next, it is bound to come. You see the different interests which are represented here upon the different post-office subjects as they are presented. The Railway Mail Service, the clerks in the post-offices, the letter carriers, and the substitute letter carriers in time must, in my judgment, be properly classified, and the sooner we get at this the better it will be for the various departments, as well as for the good of the country. There is no doubt that the post-office employees are the poorest paid of any class of men in the Government service for the work they perform.

Take the clerks, for instance, who are employed upon the railroads. Why, sir, their death rate from accidents is larger than the death rate in the Army in ordinary times, and the same is true of those who are maimed. They are subject to discomforts, as well as to casualties, such as broken limbs, etc. Then take the case of the post-office clerks. They work early and late. Sick or well, they must be at their posts. So with the carriers. They are all doing an important service, and it is impossible for us to give any charity, so to speak, to the carrier who happens to be a little late on his route.

This subject must be taken up. These officials must be classified and justice must be done to the various employees in the Post-Office Department. The matter will not "down," and it ought not to. I hope to see the time when all of these clerks in the various departments will be amply and suitably paid, and they never can be until you classify this service and put it in such a shape that every clerk employed under the Post-Office Department, whether Republican or Democrat, shall know what to expect so long as he performs his duty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one word in relation to the free rural delivery. Gentlemen here are talking of the millions of dollars that will be expended in free rural delivery.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me a question—just one short question?

Mr. SPERRY. I have only a few moments.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask only this question: If those men are poorly paid, why do they not give up their jobs and go to something else—go to plowing, for instance?

Mr. SPERRY. That is a question that people might ask you as a member of Congress. [Laughter.]

But in relation to this matter of free rural delivery, when gentlemen are talking about the millions which this system, if generally introduced, will cost, I wish to say that where the experiment has been tried, instead of the service promising to involve an increased expense of millions, it has nearly paid for itself. Take the county up here in Maryland in which this system has been recently organized. It is a mountainous country—a country hard to travel over. The system was established in that county about the 1st of January; and now what does the report for the last month—the month of March—show? I hold in my hand an official pamphlet just issued upon this subject. It shows that after the organization of the whole county of Carroll——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPERRY. I would like about three minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Consent is asked that the gentleman from Connecticut be allowed to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPERRY. Mr. Chairman, I will be as brief as possible. Here is the official report on the operations of the free rural delivery system in the county of Carroll, Md., for the first quarter of its existence; and what does it show? That after organizing the whole county, after dispensing with post-offices here and there the work of which could be covered by free delivery, the service during that quarter came within $236.02 of paying the postal expenses of the whole county.

Gentlemen, if you give the people in our country towns a chance to receive their letters and newspapers promptly; if you give them increased facilities for transacting their postal business; you will find that, according to the facilities you give, increased compensation will be sure to follow. I have noted this all along in the post-office business. I remember when the free delivery was established in the cities. I remember the howl that went up in all directions concerning it. And I remember that within a year after we had introduced letter carriers and after we had put up street letter boxes, after we had gone to a large expense to establish this free-delivery system, the free-delivery department of my city paid for itself, besides giving improved accommodation to the people. So it will be with the free rural delivery.

I like the remark made yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY]. Give the people a chance; develop what we have; make what we have worth having—and the only way to do it is to give proper facilities to the people—and in return they will bless you and the country will be more prosperous than ever because of what you have done. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUD. I have a proposition which I would like to make. I wish to get along with this bill; and I will ask unanimous consent that permission be given to insert remarks on this subject in the RECORD, if that will close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that unanimous consent for general leave to print will have to be given in the House.

Mr. LOUD. All right.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I yesterday in this House made a statement, a part of which is correct and a part of which may be misleading if not incorrect. I desire to make the record entirely clear. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] I said that—

It—

The free rural delivery—

has increased the mail-service delivery decidedly—

Now that statement is entirely correct—and has saved 23 per cent to the Government.

I said that in connection with this increase there had been a saving of 23 per cent. That in practical effect is true. But here is a report, which I got a glimpse of yesterday, issued to-day by the free rural delivery department, containing this statement—the one I had in mind yesterday—pertaining to Carroll County, Md. This report shows "the postal revenues" under this free rural delivery "increased 23.5 per cent" in one quarter—ending March 31.

I will insert it in the RECORD. It reads:

As the experiment progresses and the service improves the postal revenues will increase to such an extent that at the close of the first year the balance sheet will show a snug profit to the Government.

Such a prediction may safely be made for a rural free-delivery service that has, under adverse circumstances and unfavorable conditions, increased—

The quantity of mail handled 40.6 per cent;
The number of letters registered 57 per cent;
The number of money orders issued 40 per cent;
The postal revenues 23.5 per cent.

The fourfold object of the "Carroll County" experiment set forth in the beginning of this report has been attained, for the results demonstrate conclusively—

(1) That the rural free-delivery service within the territory covered by the experiment has successfully supplanted the old system, embracing fourth-class post-offices and star routes.

(2) It has proved an effective agency for the extension of the registry and money-order systems.

(3) It has increased the postal revenues of the county.

(4) Its net cost is insignificant.

That is to say, Mr. Chairman, that the postal revenues in the county of Carroll and the State of Maryland had increased to that extent.

Mr. BROMWELL. Has the gentleman from Tennessee a report from any other section of the country besides Carroll County, in Maryland, to which he is referring?

Mr. GAINES. I do not know that there is, sir, in this pamphlet. There may be, but I have not examined.

Mr. BROMWELL. The suggestion that I made on yesterday was that in this particular locality the facts alleged may be true, as an isolated case, but when you come to consider the matter as a whole, it is not my understanding that the rural free delivery has increased the revenues, but, on the contrary, has rather diminished them.

Mr. GAINES. I was saying that the data that I have here at hand refer to the rural free-delivery service in Carroll County, Md.

The output and income for the quarter is found on page 15, which I read:

Statement, quarter ended March 31.

Total cost of service for the quarter		$4,543.19
One-quarter of the annual savings effected by the service	$2,805.42
Increase of revenue caused by the service	1,501.75
		4,307.17
Net cost of rural free delivery per quarter		236.02

The net cost was $236.02.

Quite recently I had some experience with the rural free-delivery department of the post-office here in Washington. I went to see, sir, what could be done in response to the wishes of some of my people, and I wish to say, in answer to what my good friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said a few moments ago, that I have made application by petition for the rural free-delivery service in my own home county of Davidson, in Tennessee, in Stewart and in Cheatham counties, inland counties—I mean where there are no railroads—and Montgomery County, and the system has been ordered to go into effect on the 1st day of May in Davidson County. In my old home district, the district where I was born and reared, a route was laid out last week from Wrencoe post-office.

This region is rocky and hilly and hard for horse or man to get over, as much so as most any other part of the entire country, I think, and yet I got an order for the establishment of this delivery service on that route a few days ago, to be started, as I have stated, on the 1st day of May.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am frank to state, when my good friend from Missouri goes and lays the matter properly before the Department, without reference to whether they have roads or whether the roads are filled with muck and mire, whether there are rivers and water courses to be crossed, and bad roads generally, that these considerations, generally, would not enter largely into the settlement of the matter, but that with a little attention he will secure the inception of the service.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we have to take our turns, as we did at the old country mills—first come, first served.

We are told this is a good thing for the country people. Then let them have it. If it proves to the contrary, they will be first to condemn and finally nullify it. Their needs and wants are many. They get little succor at best; let them have this, at least for a fair trial.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on this paragraph of the bill and all amendments to it.

Mr. MADDOX. I hope the gentleman will allow me first to offer the amendment I hold in my hand.

Mr. LOUD. That may be offered after the debate is closed.

The motion of Mr. LOUD was agreed to.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, at the end of line 15, insert:

"Provided, That this service shall be equally distributed among the several Congressional districts in the United States."

Mr. LOUD. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MADDOX. What point of order?

Mr. LOUD. That it must be either new legislation or else it means nothing. It takes the discretion now vested in the Post-Office Department away from it; it enacts legislation which is not now on the statute books, and hence it must be subject to the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I do not know but what my good friend from California is correct; but he certainly did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] a few moments ago, with reference to the establishment of this service in some county down in his part of the world, where I think there is great truth in his description of the roads or want of roads. It seems that some of us must have "roads" in order to come up to the requirements of the Government, according to the distinguished gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day. And yet we are told by other gentlemen that there is a discretion resting in the Department to establish this service in certain localities whether there be roads or not, while in other sections, as I understand it, we are told that certain things have to be complied with and certain conditions must prevail before the establishment of the service.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDOX. As I understand, where gentlemen go and persist, and keep persisting and insisting, I have been advised that they can get these routes established.

Mr. GAINES. I want to say that I did not persist or insist.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MADDOX. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. You propose to distribute this rural free delivery proportionately to each Congressional district?

Mr. MADDOX. Equally, outside of the cities.

Mr. BROMWELL. I was going to ask what the gentleman would do with those districts that are entirely city districts?

Mr. MADDOX. They already have free delivery. Now, I am frank to say that this amendment was drawn hastily, and I do not know whether my friend from California [Mr. LOUD] will allow us to consider it or not; but I think if he will withdraw the point of order that we could perfect it so that it would apply everywhere, as it ought to, equally.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman is appealing to me, I think it is bad and unwise legislation, and I think if it should be put upon the bill the gentleman himself, after mature deliberation, would admit that it was unwise. It would appear to the country that we had appropriated in this bill $1,750,000 and equally divided the plunder among the Congressional districts. If the Department can not be trusted to establish this service wisely, then it ought to be discontinued; but there can be no good argument that the Post-Office Department should be compelled to establish this service in a district where it would be impossible to establish it efficiently.

Mr. MADDOX. If what we have heard to-day is true, you must admit that they have not exercised that discretion wisely.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I have heard a great many gentlemen complain of not having rural delivery in their districts, in most instances where there never has been any application from the people for the establishment of the service.

Mr. MADDOX. I have heard no such suggestion as that to-day. I have never heard of it. The general excuse is on account of bad roads. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] does away with all that sort of business in his statement and shows that it is not a question of roads.

Mr. KLUTTZ. In some places it is and some it is not.

Mr. MADDOX. Yes, as my friend suggests, in some places it is and in some it is not. Now, I understand they have 83 of these rural free-delivery districts in Ohio, or had up to the 1st of December last, 1 in Texas, 4 in Georgia, 29 in New York, 11 in Massachusetts, 21 in South Carolina, and 1 in North Carolina. Do you mean to tell me that the Department has exercised that discretion wisely? That will not begin to do.

Mr. BROMWELL. In the two Cincinnati districts, which represent the country outside, as well as the city districts, half of the city being in each of the two districts, and half of Hamilton county outside of the city being in each of the two districts, we have not a single free rural delivery route, and have not asked for it, and do not want it.

Mr. MADDOX. Of course, if you do not want it, you ought not to have it.

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman spoke about 83 in Ohio. They are in some other part of Ohio.

Mr. MADDOX. I should think with 83 in Ohio you ought to wait a while until you let some of the balance of us catch up. That is what I am contending for. I do not want to have to go to this Department to see this officer, whoever he may be, and, as some gentleman has suggested here, be compelled to appeal and persist in order to get my rights.

Mr. TALBERT. Did not the gentleman appeal on the stump a good deal to his voters and promise what he would do?

Mr. MADDOX. And I got them, too; and I want to get them again.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman ought not to complain because others have been persistent enough to get them and he has not.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, if I may be permitted to go on, I will reply to that speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] proposes a limitation, not on the appropriation, but on the functions of the Post-Office Department. Under the existing law the Postmaster-General has a discretion to dispose of and apportion this free rural delivery system as he may think best serves the public interest. To adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia would be to take away that discretion, and it is therefore obnoxious to the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER].

Mr. LATIMER. I withdrew that amendment.

Mr. McRAE. I move to strike out the word "experimental." The gentleman in charge of this service said in his last report that it is no longer experimental, and that it had come to stay. Every member of this House knows that this appropriation of $1,750,000 is not made for experiments. It is for extending this service. Let us not make a false pretense here by calling it experimental. I believe that the use of this word is to keep these employees from coming under the civil service, and to enable those in authority to make political appointments throughout the country just before we begin a Presidential election. We should enact the proper legislation to make this service permanent or stop the expense.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is not an experiment, but is a system that has come to stay, then why not make an appropriation to carry this free rural delivery to everybody?

Mr. McRAE. That is what we ought to do. That is what I want done now, and this amendment is the first step in that direction.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the justice of making fish of one and fowl of the other?

Mr. McRAE. I heartily concur in every word that my friend from Missouri has said about it. As it is administered at present it is a system of favoritism. Some can get it and some can not, without regard to the conditions or demand for it; and this injustice must of necessity be continued as long as there is not money enough appropriated to make the service general.

I am in favor of the service if it is practicable to apply it to the whole country at a reasonable expense, and we are told that it is. I have asked that the box system be applied to star-route service in Arkansas when the contracts are let again, for the reason that I see but little hope of general rural free delivery there, as small appropriations are made for it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I raise the point of order. My point of order is that this section has been passed, and debate has been closed on it.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, if it was passed, it is the fault of the Chairman and not mine, for I was on my feet and addressed the Chair before the section had been passed.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I should have made that point of order myself, if I had not seen the gentleman was on his feet seeking recognition at the time we closed the reading of the last paragraph. I think the amendment is in order, and I want to appeal to the House one moment on the question of striking out this word "experimental." This question was discussed at great length——

Mr. McRAE. I did not understand what the gentleman from California said. Did he make a point of order against my amendment?

Mr. LOUD. I said in reply to the gentleman's point of order, that I should have made the point of order if the gentleman had not been on his feet. I claim that the gentleman was clearly in order. I want to appeal to the House one moment on this question. This question was discussed for a long time in the Post-Office Committee. Of course, the House may not recognize if the word "experimental" is striken out of this paragraph then all the employees will come within the classified civil service.

Some people may say "All right, that is a good and proper thing to do." Perhaps it is. But it is not a good and proper thing to do, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, until you shall have perfected legislation to fit the case. That is, you must provide the salaries, and you must provide the officials, and the simple fact of striking out this word "experimental" would put this service in the classified service without any legislation to govern it; and I hope the House will not sustain the motion made by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How many rural free-delivery routes are there in existence?

Mr. LOUD. I have not the figures before me. I should say offhand some 1,750 or 1,800.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman, from his recollection, give us any idea of what proportion of the country is now served by rural free delivery?

Mr. LOUD. That I can not answer.

Mr. MANN. Is it a very small portion?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; it is a small portion as a whole. Of course, this service goes on gradually, according to the money that is appropriated. In many cases $400 may serve 1,500 people, and in another $500 may not serve more than 100 people.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman sits down, I would inquire of him in case we should strike out the word "experimental," and thereby determine that there should be proper service for all parts of the country, what would be the expense of furnishing rural free delivery to all communities throughout the country?

Mr. LOUD. I would not venture an opinion. I do not think that any person could express an intelligent opinion upon that question.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I hope that no amendment to this measure will be adopted that will embarrass the postal service. It seems to me that if there is anything that has been demonstrated to be of practical utility, it is the rural free mail delivery, and I do not want to see anything respecting the civil service, geographical divisions, or party politics mixed up with it. Let us give the best possible service we can to the largest number of people and vote whatever is necessary to that end. I am amazed at the statements contained in the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General on the experimental rural service in Maryland.

I do not care where that service is performed; I do not care in what community it is tried; but I think that everybody who has read this report which was filed to-day must commend the results of the experiments in Carroll County. I hope a liberal appropriation will be made for its continuance, and believe that a liberal amount will be allowed for experimental service. I do not think any strictures can be justly made upon the administration of the Post-Office Department with reference to this branch of the public service or any other branch. It is the most popular branch of the Government and serving the most useful purpose. We ought to give the farmers of the country—and they are demanding it—the best possible mail facilities.

Every morning brings me some requests or petitions from my constituents to put this service into effect, and I hope there will be no legislation that will embarrass it in the slightest degree. I am anxious that it shall be done immediately in my district and State. Let it be put in practice wherever it may be best tried, and then, if it is admitted that it is a good thing for the whole country, let us establish it as a whole and liberally sustain it. The farmers demand very little for their special benefit, and what they ask should be granted.

Yesterday the chairman of the committee, in making some observations upon this bill, referred to the fact of the greatly increasing expenses of the Post-Office Department. I know the chairman of the committee is anxious to keep appropriations down. I think the vigilance that he has exercised must commend itself to every careful man. But, Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department is only expanding to the country's needs and necessities. I asked the Post-Office Department to-day to give me the earnings of the post-office at Grand Rapids, the city in which I live, covering the first quarters of 1898, 1899, and 1900.

In the first quarter of 1898 the receipts were $181,363.46; in the first quarter of 1899 they were $198,596.82; while in the first quarter of 1900 they were $228,898.95, showing a tremendous increase in the uses to which the post-office is being applied, and it is only in harmony with the growing commerce and prosperity of the country; and for one I hope to see liberal appropriations made for this branch of the public service for enough clerks to do the work and enough carriers to reach all classes of people, with salary enough to live decently and comfortably upon. The carrier goes in storm of winter and in the heat of summer. No day is too cold and none too hot for him to perform his task, and they should be properly compensated; a just appreciation demands it, and their necessities require it. It should be delayed no longer. The Post-Office is the great clearing house of the commerce of the country, and we should give the best postal facilities possible to all communities.

The reports show that the rural communities of the country have largely increased the use of the postal facilities. Under the rural free-delivery service I am sure that the farmers of the country will be brought into closer contact with the business world and will enjoy the new facilities thus afforded them of the daily mail and the periodical and newspaper at their own door. The new system contemplates the sale of stamps, registration of letters, and all the convenience of a modern post-office.

Mr. Chairman, I want to see wise liberality prevail in all branches of the Government. I do not believe it is time for cheese paring. I do believe it is time for prudence and conservatism, but we should keep up with the march of progress and with all the requirements of the time and maintain a mail service that will serve the people best and therefore the country best. [Applause.]

[Mr. McDOWELL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, can we have a vote now?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For stationery, for postal service, $55,000.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 16, insert preceding the word "for" the words "supply division."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For postmarking, rating, and other stamps, and repairs to same, and ink and pads for stamping and canceling purposes, $30,000.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 22, after the word "postmarking," strike out the words "rating and other" and insert "and rating."

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. LACEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3539) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate, the bill of the Senate numbered 1265, granting a pension to Elender Herring.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill No. 9566, authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For packing boxes, sawdust, paste, and hardware, $1,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I want to say a word in reply to some remarks of my good friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], who, I am sorry to see, is absent just now. He spoke about Representatives being compelled to go down to the rural-delivery department and "importune and beg and nag" the officials in order to have this service introduced. If that has been the gentleman's experience, it has not been mine.

I have never in my life met a public officer who was more pleasant or more responsive to everything that I asked than the gentleman in charge of this business. I have simply filed petitions with him asking the introduction of this system in four counties of the seven I represent. In one of those four counties the system has been adopted—not, however, until the Department had sent down there an agent to investigate as to the practicability of introducing the system there.

The officer in charge of this business has promised, as soon as practicable, to send down an agent and have a similar investigation made in regard to the other three counties; and he promises, if a favorable report should be made as to the practicability of the system, to introduce it there. I have never had to "nag" him. He has always treated me with great respect, and I have treated him in the same way.

He at no time has shown the least indisposition to respond to the prayer of my people for this service. If he had, I would have known why at once, and I am sure those who complain here to-day would receive like consideration under similar circumstances. I say all this, Mr. Chairman, in defense of this efficient officer, who has no voice in this body.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For inland mail transportation, namely: Inland transportation by star routes, including temporary service to newly established offices, $5,240,000: Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster-General is authorized to provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "therefor," in line 25, page 14, insert the following:

"Provided further, That any person living on or near any star route who desires his mail deposited in a box on the line of the route by the carrier on said route may provide and erect a suitable box on the roadside, located in such manner as to be reached as conveniently as practicable by the carrier, and such person shall file with the postmaster at the post-office to which his mail is addressed (which shall be one of the two post-offices on the route on either side of and next to the box) a request in writing for the delivery of his mail to the carrier on the route for deposit in said mail box, at the risk of the addressee.

"That it shall be the duty of the postmaster at every such post-office, upon a written order from any person living on or near the star route, to deliver to the proper mail carrier for that route any mail matter, except registered mail, with instructions as to the proper mail box into which said mail matter shall be deposited; but no mail matter so delivered to a carrier for deposit shall be carried past another post-office on the route before being deposited in a mail box.

"That the carrier on the star route shall be required to receive from any postmaster on the route any mail matter that may be intrusted to him, outside of the usual mail bag, and shall carry such mail matter to and deposit it in the proper boxes placed on the line of the route for this purpose, such service by the carrier to be without charge to the addressees.

"That the mail carriers must be able to read and write the English language and be of sufficient intelligence to properly handle and deposit the mail for boxes along the routes.

"That every carrier of the mail shall receive any mail matter presented to him, if properly prepaid by stamps, and deliver the same for mailing at the next post-office at which he arrives, but that no fees shall be allowed him therefor.

"That the contract price shall cover all the extra service required of the carrier that is indicated herein."

Mr. LOUD. I make a point of order on this amendment. It is clearly new legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that point of order. This amendment is simply a copy of an order of the Postmaster-General that is now in operation in South Carolina, where it has been found to work well. The Postmaster-General has now authority under the law to extend this system wherever he desires, but I think we should provide in this bill that it be extended over the United States, instead of being applied only to individual States here and there.

The amendment provides for placing boxes at different points on any star route, so that people living several miles away from the post-office may have their mail matter delivered to or collected from these boxes. This will certainly be a great benefit in all the thinly settled portions of the country, and will be a great accommodation to thousands of people who now have to travel a great many miles to the regular post-office in order to receive or deliver their mail matter. The mail carrier will only have to stop a moment, unlock the box, drop his mail in, and take out the matter intended to be mailed, and carry it to the next post-office. In this manner the mail matter is delivered and received by the roadside. This will be a great accommodation to the people, and will expedite the carrying of the mails.

As I have stated, the amendment is in the exact language of an order now in effect in the State of South Carolina, where it has been found to work well. We want to extend this system over the entire West. In a great portion of that country it is impossible, on account of the sparseness of the population, to have the benefits of the free rural delivery. We ask you that in those sections of the country the people be allowed to place their own boxes by the roadside on any star route, and have their mail matter delivered to or collected from those boxes, the matter collected being carried to the next post-office.

Mr. BROMWELL. Would not the practical effect of this amendment be to convert every star route into a branch of the rural free-delivery system? And if such a provision should be enacted into law, would we not be obliged to revise the contract of every star-route contractor by reason of the additional trouble and expense which the system the gentleman proposes would involve? It strikes me that the proposition means practically the extension of rural free delivery to every star route in the country.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman's view of the matter is correct; but that could be done at very small expense, and thereby people would be reached who could not be accommodated in any other way. As to the revision of the contracts of star-route contractors which the gentleman says would be rendered necessary, if this provision were made a part of our law the new contracts which may be entered into for star-route service could contain a provision for additional compensation. The contract price could be fixed with reference to this additional labor which would be imposed on the mail carrier. This additional labor would be very light. It would take but a moment for the carrier to drive up to the mail box, unlock, leave in it the mail which he was to deliver and take out the mail previously deposited for the purpose of being taken to the next post-office.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. These boxes are placed at just the proper height to be easily accessible and convenient for a man in a wagon.

Mr. COX. Suppose he is riding a mule! [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas, in reply to what he has suggested, that I quite agree with him in some respects, although I am compelled to submit the point of order against the amendment. I think it might solve the question of the rural free delivery, but I do not believe in putting in this bill a measure that would compel the Post-Office Department practically to cancel every star-route contract and to establish this new service. I understand the Department intends and will, as they have the right to under existing law, establish such service wherever it is required or as it may be required.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question: If the point of order is sustained, whether or not he will report favorably the bill which is before his committee?

Mr. LOUD. I do not think it necessary, Mr. Chairman. I think the service will come as fast as it is necessary to establish it, in the regular order of things, and will be put on by the Department as it may be required.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you think the Post-Office Department, with the authority which it now has by law, is able to require mail matter to be deposited and collected, as the amendment proposes it should be deposited and collected, by the carriers?

Mr. LOUD. I do not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then how could the work be done?

Mr. LOUD. My answer to the gentleman refers to the existing contracts. I think in submitting a new contract, or taking bids for new contracts, that provision might be inserted in them. It does not appear in existing contracts, and it could not very well be enforced in the present contracts. While the Department may possibly have the right to enforce such a regulation, it is manifest that they would be calling for additional service throughout the country.

Mr. LATIMER. That system is now in operation in some parts of North Carolina, and is satisfactory.

Mr. LOUD. I have no doubt of it; and, as I have suggested, it will doubtless be adopted generally after a while.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am entirely willing, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment shall be inserted upon my amendment that whenever a star-route contract is ended a succeeding contract shall contain this provision for the extra service contemplated.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is out of order, but that the work contemplated to be done will eventually be accomplished. I ask a ruling on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "dollars," in line 21 on page 14, the words:

"Of which sum $50,000 shall be used, under the direction of the Postmaster-General, in supplying temporary service to the newly established offices in cases where the establishment of star routes is contemplated."

Mr. LOUD. I must raise the question of order upon that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I hope the gentleman will withhold the point of order for a moment and allow me to state the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. LOUD. Very well.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to call the attention of the House to a very important branch of the postal service which is usually overlooked. It strikes me that this branch of the postal service has been more neglected than any other.

The object of the amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to segregate $50,000 from the general appropriation and specifically apply it for the purpose of extending the star-route service to the newly established post-offices. It contemplates the inauguration of this temporary service until the Postmaster-General can determine whether or not it is necessary to establish an office permanently in any particular community.

Now, I represent a district which has communities—rural communities—far beyond the line of the star-route service. I hope gentlemen will give me their attention for a moment. I am much interested in this matter, while gentlemen who are living in the great cities, the great centers of population, and have their free mail delivery six or eight times a day at their doors, and when that is not sufficient they have this pneumatic process—the air tubes, the pop-gun process [laughter]—by which they can, between times, get their mails, while we have to depend on a very different system. You are not interested as I am in this matter, because your wants are already fully supplied.

Under the general law the Postmaster-General can establish post-offices wherever, in his judgment, the public interest demands it. But there are communities, beyond the reach of the postal routes, which have no mail facilities whatever. Under the law the Postmaster-General can appropriate annually two-thirds of the salary allowed the postmaster of the new office for this particular service; but a new office in a small community is not as a rule a paying institution, and two-thirds of the entire compensation would not pay a man to carry the mails once a week even over the route to the supply office, and business interests can not afford to wait for the development of the enterprise.

This amendment seeks to give the Postmaster-General specific control of the $50,000, so that he may hire somebody to carry this mail until the experiment has been demonstrated; but you say, let the community pay for it. He pays two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster, which in no case can exceed 75 per cent of the cancellation of stamps at the new office, and perhaps will not amount to more than ten or fifteen dollars a year. Then it depends on the citizens of the community to take the money out of their pockets and pay somebody to carry the mail as an experiment.

I say that when this Government finds a community of people—twenty families, for instance, or ten families—that ought to demonstrate that they are entitled to the beneficent appropriations of Congress as well as other people. Supplying mail facilities is not a business in which the Government engages for the purpose of making a profit. You have reported here by the Postmaster-General a deficit for the present fiscal year of $6,610,000. Somebody has been benefited by it without paying anything in return.

Now, I hope this House will make it the duty of the Postmaster-General to use the $50,000 to pay for carrying the mail and not put the burden on the people. This amendment passed the House in the Fifty-third Congress; it went to the Senate, and as modified there it was so framed as to give the Postmaster-General the discretion to use it, but not a dollar has been used to this good day. I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads accept this amendment and give these people this $50,000. It would be a great blessing. There was an unexpended balance of $95,000 last year covered back into the public Treasury, not used, which had been appropriated to the star-route service.

Now, why not take that and pay some of it for this experiment? Business will not wait on experiments. The people who live out in those rural districts are patriotic citizens and deserve just treatment. They can not escape public burdens. They must pay taxes; they must work the public roads; they must render military duty when this great Government calls on them; so it is not fair or just to compel them to wait until they have demonstrated out of their private means whether the service should be established. The fact that they have located homes there is evidence to us that they need these facilities. They want to get into contact with the great, throbbing business world. Reading the newspapers and communicating with the outside world will advance civilization and elevate citizenship. Then the service will pay. If it does not, these people will at least be benefited.

I hope the chairman of the committee will accept this; and if not, I should like to have him state why he will not do it, instead of getting up here and exercising his prerogative by making a point of order. Anybody can do that without much effort. There is nothing strange or unusual about having brute force, but it is no credit to use it in the way that the brute uses it. I hope the gentleman will reserve his power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to have about five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am trying to induce the chairman of the committee to accept this amendment. He knows very well that in the Fifty-third Congress this same proposition was made, and he and I discussed it then, and it passed the House without his making the point of order. I certainly hope as the gentleman grows older he will grow better and more indulgent toward the people who live out in these back districts.

I ask the chairman of the committee if he will not accept it and allow the people out in the country districts to have this small consideration, since the money was not used this year? You have a surplus from that appropriation for this fiscal year. Let me say to the chairman of the committee that I had a conference with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General this morning, and he says that notwithstanding the wording of this amendment, he can not use a dollar of it as the law now provides and as this bill provides. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not accept this amendment?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman pleads very hard; but if what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General says is true, what would it avail? He could not use it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I say under the general law he can not use it unless it be segregated and set apart from the general appropriation.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman must understand that the chairman of a committee is bound to protect his bill according to the wishes of his committee in the first place, and then, in the second place, you are seeking to enact a dangerous piece of legislation, because, if this amendment should pass, then you will place in the hands of the Post-Office Department the power to establish star-route service under such conditions and terms as they may choose to prescribe. If they wanted to give a friend $500 for carrying the mail once a year, they would be at liberty to do it under the gentleman's amendment. I regard the legislation as vicious. The present method has prevailed for more than sixty years, and the country has progressed under it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have more confidence in the Post-Office Department than the gentleman seems to have. There was a surplus from this appropriation, and it certainly can not invade the general appropriation so as to interfere with the efficiency of the star-route service generally. I am satisfied that the money would be used judiciously. The surplus from this item will be ample to meet this demand.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman must not anticipate——

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not an anticipation. There has been from year to year a surplus, as the gentleman will see if he will examine the citations. It is not anticipating; it is merely using a balance which has gone back into the public Treasury from year to year.

Mr. LOUD. Let me say to the gentleman that it is not a question of money. The sum of $50,000 on a bill that carries one hundred and fourteen or one hundred and fifteen million dollars is so insignificant that it is scarcely worth consideration, but it is the dangerous character of the legislation which makes it objectionable.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes, it is very dangerous when you undertake to benefit somebody away back in these back districts; you appropriate millions to facilitate the mails in the great centers. If star routes were established at once to every newly established post-office in the whole country, it would be a mere trifle in point of cost, and it ought to be done. No dangerous precedent would be established. One thousand five hundred and five offices were discontinued during the last year and mainly because of the lack of service.

Now, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that it is subject to the point of order, because there is a general law providing for the Postmaster-General to employ service on these contemplated routes, and it is merely a segregation, a diversion, of an appropriation already made. It does not increase the appropriation. It certainly can not come as a point of order on account of an increase of an appropriation. There is an existing law for the appropriation, and I do not think the point of order is well taken by the gentleman from California. It is simply a limitation upon the appropriation, a diversion, and the general law provides for this service to supply those post-offices which have been newly established.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a limitation upon the appropriation; it is a limitation upon the functions of the Post-Office Department. It takes away from the Postmaster-General that discretion that he now has and is therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, obnoxious to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of mail by pneumatic tube, or other similar devices, by purchase or otherwise, $725,000.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to raise the point of order against that paragraph, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10301, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request of the Senate; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 23, 1900.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3630) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

ELENDER HERRING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 24, 1900.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate numbered 1265, "granting a pension to Elender Herring."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ACHESON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Taylor McFarland, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service submitting an estimate of appropriation for maintaining the quarantine service in Porto Rico—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KENNEY, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal, without objection, will stand approved.

REPORT OF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION ON PRISON LABOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Industrial Commission, transmitting the report of the commission on prison labor; which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 3639) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate requesting the President to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1265) granting a pension to Elender Herring.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9564) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ALBERT S. AUSTIN.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3605) to correct the military record of Albert S. Austin, to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed, and to report a new bill for the same person.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill to correct the military record of Albert S. Austin.

This is a bill which has been pending for some time and the reports have been prepared for some time. It is a matter of great justice, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a very short one, and it will take only a moment.

The bill (S. 4324) to correct the military record of Albert S. Austin was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to review and revoke "General Court-Martial Orders, No. 9, Headquarters Army of the Potomac, April 1, 1864," approving the proceedings, finding, and sentence in the case of Albert S. Austin, captain and commissary of subsistence of volunteers, assigned to duty as chief commissary of subsistence, cavalry corps, with rank of lieutenant-colonel, and to disapprove the same, and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date April 1, 1864.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATES OF ANN H. SHALER AND ELIZA LAWRENCE.

Mr. RAWLINS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the bill (S. 2975) for the relief of the heirs of Ann H. Shaler, of Campbell County, Ky., and the bill (S. 1136) for the relief of the estate of Eliza Lawrence, deceased, late of Shelby County, Tenn., reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2975) entitled "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Ann H. Shaler, of Campbell County, Ky.," and the bill (S. 1136) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of Eliza Lawrence, deceased, late of Shelby County, Tenn.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

FIELD OPERATIONS OF THE DIVISION OF SOILS.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed from the stereotype plates now in the Government Printing Office an extra edition of 13,000 copies of Report No. 64 of the Department of Agriculture, entitled "Field Operations of the Division of Soils in 1899;" 2,000 copies for distribution by Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives; 1,000 copies for distribution by Senators, and 10,000 copies for distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture.

INVESTIGATION OF FOOD SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] on the 10th instant, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be printed for the use of Congress the usual number of copies of the "record of the court of inquiry, convened February 25, 1899, in accordance with the instructions of the President of February 3, 1899, to investigate certain allegations of the Major-General Commanding the Army in respect to the unfitness for issue of certain articles of food furnished by the Subsistence Department to the troops in the field during the recent operations in Cuba and Porto Rico," and that when the same is printed that the original record shall be returned to the War Department for file.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection, and the resolution goes to the Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas subsequently said: The Senator from New York, from the Committee on Printing, a few moments ago reported a resolution favorably and asked for its consideration, to which there was objection made. I am sure that the objection was made from a misapprehension of what the resolution is. I ask that the resolution may be laid before the Senate again, with a view to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the resolution reported by the Senator from New York from the Committee on Printing be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTES ON THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. HALE March 28, 1900, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed 4,500 copies of Notes on the Spanish-American War, Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, with accompanying papers and documents, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 copies for the use of the Navy Department.

NEW YORK PRINTING EXPOSITION.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 113) authorizing the exhibit of Government relics at the New York Printing Exposition from May 2 to June 2, 1900, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, in section 4, page 2, line 15, to strike out all after the word "authorized" and insert:

In his discretion to permit the removal for exhibit at said exposition of such articles now in the National Museum which are the property of the United States as may be of interest to the printing trade.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at the New York Printing Exposition, from May 2 to June 2, 1900, a geometrical scroll machine and such other articles now in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as may be of interest to the printing trades; also "a picture of Governor William Allen, of Ohio, on a saw blade," now in the possession of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department; also copies of charts of Hell Gate, the Battery, and other New York City points, to be printed from original copperplates now in the possession of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and such other articles in said bureaus as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at said exposition medical catalogues, old volumes, works in Russian and other foreign tongues, now in the possession of the Surgeon-General of the Army; also samples of work and manuscripts written on stumps, etc., by generals in the war of the rebellion, now in the possession of the Rebellion Records Division of the War Department, and such other articles as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to exhibit at said exposition such general exhibit of patents as may be of interest to the printing trades.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to permit the removal for exhibit at said exposition of such articles now in the National Museum which are the property of the United States as may be of interest to the printing trade.

SEC. 5. That all expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution shall be paid by the directors of the New York Printing Exposition, under such regulations as shall be adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF DENNIS O'DEA.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1565) for the relief of the estate of Dennis O'Dea, deceased, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1565) entitled "A bill for the relief of the estate of Dennis O'Dea, deceased," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

And the House agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
C. D. CLARK,
JOHN T. MORGAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. S. KNOX,
R. R. HITT,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CULLOM. Substantially all of the report has been read twice before. Whether the rule requires that it shall be read in full again, I do not know. I can point out, if it is agreeable to the Senate, the exact changes that have been made by the last conference report, and it might save some time and some reading, if that course is satisfactory.

The Senate will remember that it was brought out in the discussion of the report some days ago that there was a provision which required that a person desiring to register and vote, should before a certain date, the 31st of March of the year, pay all his taxes, which was the provision in the bill as the conferees agreed to it.

During the discussion of that conference report it was found that two or three sections of the body of the laws which the commission and the committee had printed in the laws to be preserved contained a provision for imprisonment for the nonpayment of taxes or for debt. Therefore it was that the judgment of the Senate, as the Senate will remember, was manifestly against that provision and against the provision which required the payment of taxes before registration, and so, by the consent of the conferees, the report was disagreed to and sent back to the conferees of the two Houses.

The work of the last conference resulted in the striking out from the conference report of all the provisions requiring the payment of taxes before registration and also inserting a provision in the bill to the effect that no person shall be imprisoned for nonpayment of taxes or for debt.

Those two items are substantially the amendments as made by the last conference report. I will read them in the bill, so that there may be no mistake about them.

The provision which reads "That no person shall be subject to imprisonment for nonpayment of taxes nor for debt" was inserted by the conferees in section 10 of the bill referred to in the conference report. Then a provision, on page 26 of the reported bill, read as follows:

Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid on or before the 31st day of March next preceding the date of registration, all taxes due by him to the government.

That paragraph was stricken out entirely, and the other paragraphs renumbered. That provision being stricken out did away with the payment of taxes before registration and voting. Then the other provision in reference to imprisonment inserted in section 10 of the bill, that "no person shall be subject to imprisonment for nonpayment of taxes nor for debt," leaves the matter, so far as the payment of taxes is concerned, either before registration or at any other time, entirely out of the bill.

Mr. BACON. Now, I should like to ask the Senator, that having been done, what is the present requirement for the exercise of suffrage so as to show, as the bill remains, what is the change which has been stated by the Senator?

Mr. CULLOM. That provision was in the bill in connection with section 60, with reference to voting for representatives. I will read the whole paragraph:

SEC. 60. That in order to be qualified to vote for representatives a person shall—

First. Be a male citizen of the United States.

Second. Have resided in the Territory not less than one year preceding and in the representative district in which he offers to register not less than three months immediately preceding the time at which he offers to register.

Third. Have attained the age of 21 years.

Fourth. Prior to each regular election, during the time prescribed by law for registration, have caused his name to be entered on the register of voters for representatives for his district.

Fifth. Prior to such registration have paid a poll tax of $1 for the current year, due by him to the government.

That was stricken out; and the conferees inserted in place of it the provision that was in the bill as it was passed by the Senate. I can not put my eye on the provision inserted in the bill by the Senate at the moment, but the whole provision was stricken out requiring taxes to be paid before registration.

Mr. BACON. Even the poll tax?

Mr. CULLOM. Even the poll tax; and then the other provision in reference to imprisonment was put in in section 10.

That no person shall be subject to imprisonment for nonpayment of taxes nor for debt.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So that, if the conference report is adopted, there will be no requirement for the payment of any tax whatever as a prerequisite to the right to vote?

Mr. CULLOM. None whatever.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. And there is no imprisonment for debt or nonpayment of taxes?

Mr. CULLOM. Not a word. The only other provision that the last conference committee made to the bill was to change the paragraph on page 9 of the conference report of the bill. I will read the paragraph as it stood with the amendment made before the last conference. The provision read:

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to merchant seamen.

The conference committee changed that provision so as to read as follows:

Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not modify or change the laws of the United States applicable to merchant seamen.

So as to extend the laws of the United States over those islands.

Mr. BACON. Now, as I understand from the statement of the Senator, all citizens of the United States and of the republic of Hawaii are authorized to exercise the elective franchise, and that according to the constitution of Hawaii all bona fide inhabitants——

Mr. CULLOM. Were made citizens when the republic was established.

Mr. BACON. Yes; all who were on the 12th day of August, 1898—the day fixed—then citizens of the republic of Hawaii now have the right to vote.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the provision in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report of the conference committee?

Mr. TILLMAN. There was a provision in the conference report in regard to the limiting of the appointment of the governor, the judges, and all Territorial officers to citizens of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill remains exactly as it was when it was previously before the Senate on the question of citizenship. The bill originally provided that the officers should only be required to be residents of Hawaii. The House amended it so as to make all officers appointed by the President to be citizens of the Territory. The House conferees, I may be allowed to state, said that they could not yield that; that if they did, there would probably be but two votes for the conference report, one of the conferees stating that he could not vote for it himself. Therefore the Senate conferees finally yielded on that question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want the Senate to understand that we are making a difference in this Territory from any other Territory, by which the President is limited in the appointment of these important officers to residents or citizens of Hawaii, whereas he can send into Arizona or New Mexico or Oklahoma or Alaska a citizen from outside. I never could see the reason why this special favoritism should be given to the Hawaiians; but if the Senate is to support the conference report and the bill is to become a law with that provision in it I shall not resist it.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator knows there has been a good deal of controversy upon the question whether the offices in a Territory should not be filled by persons living in the Territory.

Mr. TILLMAN. The only trouble is that we have just passed a bill for Porto Rico, in which we expressly provided for a large number of American citizens of this country to go down there to administer that government. I can not see why there should be this difference in the treatment of the two islands.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not know so much about the Porto Ricans as I do about the Hawaiians.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CULLOM. In one moment. I merely want to say that I am not as familiar with the people of Porto Rico as I am with the people of Hawaii and with the qualifications of the men of those islands. I apprehend, however, there is considerable difference between the qualifications of a great many of the people in the Hawaiian Islands and those in Porto Rico. That may be the reason for dealing with one in one way and with the other in another. It certainly, in my judgment, is not a reason why this conference report should be rejected, because I am satisfied the President can find just as good men in Hawaii as he can anywhere else; and if he finds that he can not, we can change this law later on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am equally satisfied we can find just as good men in Porto Rico to run affairs in Porto Rico as we can find in the United States to send there to run them, but in view of my irrepressible and inherited objection to carpetbagism, I fought that idea in regard to Porto Rico, and I am glad to see that the gentlemen in charge of this proposition do not propose to have any carpetbaggers in Hawaii.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to say we have just passed a bill in regard to Porto Rico requiring that appointees be made from citizens of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; I did not. But I said you did not protect the people of Porto Rico against the imposition upon them of appointees from here, as you do with the Hawaiians.

Mr. FORAKER. In so far as there is any provision at all on that subject that that could have reference to, it is that not less than so many shall be appointed from Porto Rico. All may be appointed from Porto Rico if the President sees fit.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the very fact that you make the limitation indicates that you expect the other thing to happen; and it has happened and will continue to happen.

Mr. FORAKER. Possibly it may happen; but it does not necessarily so follow. The President is at liberty to make all his appointments from the citizens of Porto Rico if he so desires, but I apprehend he will make some appointments from among the people of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if he will not read that clause with reference to the appointment of citizens to office as it will stand in the bill, if it is no trouble to him to do so.

Mr. CULLOM. It occurs in two or three places. For instance, in the clause providing for the appointment of a governor, the language is:

> He shall not be less than 35 years of age; shall be a citizen of the Territory of Hawaii; shall be commander in chief of the militia thereof, etc.

There is a similar provision as to citizenship in reference to the secretary of state and the supreme and circuit judges of the Territory; but it does not apply to the Federal judge, the marshal, or the district attorney.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By whom are the other officers to be confirmed—the Senate of the United States?

Mr. CULLOM. The President appoints the governor, the supreme judges, and the circuit judges. They are all nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Of the United States?

Mr. CULLOM. Of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I know it is useless to attempt in the Senate to defeat this conference report on account of these provisions which have been assented to by the conferees, but I wish to enter my protest against that portion of the report which takes away from the President of the United States the right to appoint officers from the entire United States, excepting Hawaii, if that be in the United States, as I suppose it is brought in by this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It will certainly be in the United States when this bill becomes a law, if language in a statute can bring it in.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it is a question open to very serious constitutional doubt. I remember to have heard an argument made by a former colleague of the Senator, Senator Palmer, upon the subject of the right of Congress to limit the power of the President to appoint officers. It made a very great impression upon me, and from that time I have doubted whether it was in the power of Congress so to limit the President in his appointing power.

But whether that be so or not, I believe it extremely bad policy in every way in which it can be viewed. It does not at all answer the objections to it to say that there are good men in Hawaii to fill the offices. I have no doubt that is true; but there are good men elsewhere. There can be no reason in our system of government for excluding from the right to appointment in a Territory by the President all the people of the United States except those who live in the Territory.

As I have said, I have no idea that I can defeat this conference report, but I am not willing that this portion of it shall go without my earnest protest.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I have always believed that the officers of the Territories should be selected from the citizens thereof, but there is certainly less reason why this rule should apply to Hawaii than to any other Territory of the United States. There is there an exceedingly small group of people to select from, a very few Americans or people of American descent, and none have gone to Hawaii to make it their home since the annexation of that country. But, on the contrary, there has been added to the population over 30,000 contract laborers.

The group of Americans in Hawaii number about 3,000 people of American descent. Of that number about 2,000 are males of all ages, and from this group are to be selected the officers of that Territory. These are the men who have enacted contract or slave labor laws for Hawaii. These are the men who, in establishing the republic, limited the suffrage to people who are large property owners, and thus reduced the number of people who could vote under the monarchy from 14,000 to about 2,600. These are the men who enacted a law that if a man did not pay his taxes he could be imprisoned at hard labor until he earned enough at 50 cents a day to pay the indebtedness, and from this group of men are to be selected the officers of that Territory.

For judges we are to select from the two lawyers of Hawaii. Those lawyers, who are now on the bench and who under this law will be continued as the judicial officers of that Territory, are the men who decided that a contract for slave labor was a civil contract, and that for breach of that contract by one of the victims he could be imprisoned for life if he would not consent to go back and perform the slave service under the provisions of his contract, and that the Constitution of the United States was not in force in Hawaii. An exception is made, then, for the purpose of perpetuating, of continuing in office the men who have done these things. That is all I care to say about that branch of the subject.

But there is another provision in this conference report to which I object, and that is the provision giving an American registry to four ships.

Mr. CULLOM. Five ships.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Well, five ships. Before Hawaii was annexed several vessels were admitted to Hawaiian registry because the owners of the vessels believed that the islands would be annexed and that they would then obtain an American register. When we annexed the islands there is no doubt those vessels received an American register. But after we annexed the islands they continued the practice of issuing Hawaiian registers, and they issued registers to seven vessels. This was an unlawful act. There was no authority for it; they had no right to do it. Complaint was made to the President of the United States, and the practice ceased, although nine other vessels had applied for Hawaiian registers. The Attorney-General of the United States decided that it was unlawful to issue these registers; that it could not be done, and therefore the President issued orders that the laws of Hawaii should be suspended, and no more registers be granted.

In view of the fact that the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States will only apply to Hawaii after this bill becomes a law and goes into effect, which will be forty-five days from now, I wonder where the President got his authority to legislate for Hawaii and to repeal the laws of Hawaii? Certainly not under the provision that he shall execute the laws of the United States or the Constitution of the United States. If the theory of the imperialists in this body is correct, he did not get it under the war-making power, for we did not conquer Hawaii; we bought it; we annexed it; we absorbed it under an agreement not ratified or consented to by the people of Hawaii, but under an agreement made with those men who, with the assistance of our naval force, had overthrown the lawful government of Hawaii.

I ask, where does the President get his authority to issue an order to the authorities of Hawaii not to issue any more American registers? It was done simply because the shipbuilders of the United States did not want competition. If he could do that, however, if there was any warrant of law or any authority from any source which authorized him to do that, he could equally as well have ordered that they should stop importing slave labor, but that he did not see fit to do. The property interests of the United States were the special interests which the President wished to guard and not the labor of the United States. Consequently after our flag went up there were imported into Hawaii 37,000 contract laborers, who were bound to perform service under taskmasters who could decide whether they were sick or well enough to work during a certain number of years. These men can now come to the United States from Hawaii.

The President did not see fit to protect the labor of the United States against this importation of contract laborers, but he did see fit to stop the registration of Hawaiian ships. Of course, Hawaii is a part of the United States under the provisions of this law, and these 37,000 Asiatic laborers can now come, without any hindrance whatever, to the United States, for under the provisions of this bill their contracts are declared null and void, and the United States is authorized to at once notify them of the termination of their contracts. So I see no reason why large numbers of these men shall not immediately come to our shores to compete with the laborers of this country.

This doctrine of imperialism, Mr. President, it seems to me, must drive the Republican party to the abandonment of the doctrine of protection. It practically has done it. That party must choose between their imperial colonies, which they govern against the will of the people of those countries, and the protection by law of the American laborer. The effort to do both will be a failure.

The feeble pretense in the case of Porto Rico will deceive nobody. Fifteen per cent of the Dingley duties is not a protection, and the importation of slave laborers is certainly not a measure of protection to the laborers of the United States. Of course I know the conference report will be adopted. We have eliminated from the bill many of its most pernicious features as presented here by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The bill as it came to us provided for a large property qualification in order to vote; it provided for the enslavement of men who did not pay their taxes, for imprisonment at hard labor, and, in my opinion, provided for the continuation of the labor contract system in that Territory. I think those objectionable features have been eliminated, and therefore the bill is much better than it was as it was first presented to us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the conference committee?

The report was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, is the morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is concluded, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that the agricultural appropriation bill, being House bill 10538, be now taken up.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I will ask the Senator to yield to me that I may call up the resolution which affects the seat of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], which, I think, will not take very long. It is the report of all the Committee on Privileges and Elections except one member of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of resolution No. 213.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution reported by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which will be read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask if the debate on the resolution is to be limited as to time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is, the five-minute rule does not apply?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not apply. The resolution has been taken up on motion, and is a privileged question. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. MCCOMAS from the Committee on Privileges and Elections March 13, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That NATHAN B. SCOTT has been duly elected a Senator from the State of West Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1899, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, the certificate of the junior Senator from West Virginia was in due form, and he was seated. Certain remonstrants protested that he is not entitled to retain his seat.

These memorials came in for decision by the committee upon the proceedings in the journals, agreed facts, and admissions of counsel.

It is true the remonstrants offered to prove declarations of a couple of State officials, of several members of the assembly, and of attorneys before committees, and certain acts of little significance detailed in certain ex parte depositions, or rather printed copies of them.

The committee was almost unanimous in the opinion that there was no proffer of evidence of frauds or intimidation to warrant any investigation of these vague and unimportant matters. I will briefly state the case made before the committee, confining myself to undisputed facts:

On January 24, 1899, the houses voted separately for Senator.

On January 25, 1899, both houses met in joint assembly. Ninety-five votes were cast. Mr. SCOTT received 48 votes, Mr. McGraw 46 votes, and Mr. Goff 1 vote. Mr. SCOTT received a clear majority of the votes cast, and was declared duly elected Senator, and the convention adjourned.

A quorum of the joint assembly, or quorum of each house, was present and voted. The proceedings were regular, and Mr. SCOTT was elected unless some or all of the objections I now recite invalidate his election.

1. The first objection assigned by the remonstrants is that there were 97 votes constituting the joint assembly, that 49 votes was a majority; but Mr. SCOTT received only 48 votes.

But the journal shows 25 senators and 70 members present and voting. The total was 95, and Mr. SCOTT received 48 votes, a majority of the votes cast. It is true that by the apportionment of West Virginia the senate contained one more and the house one more member.

Prima facie, from the journal, these seats were vacant or these members were not present. They did not, if present, vote, or claim the right to vote. Mr. SCOTT'S majority was a valid majority.

As was said in Lapham and Miller (Senate Election Cases, page 602):

> The ground alleged is that there was not a majority of the whole legislature actually voting for the members chosen. In our opinion that is not necessary. There was a quorum of each house present in the joint assembly; there was a majority of that quorum actually voting for the members chosen. In our opinion that was a valid election.

See also Clark and Maginnis vs. Sanders and Power (Senate Election Cases, 637); Davidson vs. Call (Senate Election Cases, 711).

The journals of the senate and house explain the nonparticipation of the senator from the Fourth senatorial district and the member of the house of delegates from Taylor County.

On January 20, 1899 (Senate Journal, page 66), a resolution was introduced in the senate declaring that Kidd, the sitting member, was not elected and that Morris was duly elected, directing that Kidd vacate his seat and Morris be sworn in.

On January 23, 1899 (Senate Journal, 91-94), this resolution was considered and a substitute was adopted reciting the contest between Kidd and Morris, the reference to and pendency of the contest before the committee on privileges and elections, and the opinion of the senate that Morris was entitled to the seat pending the contest, wherefore the senate resolved that Kidd was not entitled and that Morris was entitled to a seat in the senate from the Fourth senatorial district pending the contest, and that Morris be sworn in. Morris took the oath and was seated.

On January 25, 1899 (Senate Journal, page 1081), the senate adopted a resolution that the contested-election case of Morris vs. Kidd be the special order for February 7, 1899, with leave to either party to take testimony, and "that pending the determination of such contest neither Morris nor Kidd should be entitled to vote or sit as a member of this body."

The journal of the house shows that in the contest of Dent for the seat of Brohard a like course was pursued, and a resolution was passed that pending the decision neither Dent nor Brohard "be permitted to participate in the proceedings of this house." The judgment of the senate was a finality in respect of Morris vs. Kidd. The judgment of the house was a finality in respect of Dent vs. Brohard. Each house, by the constitution of West Virginia, is made "the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members." Therefore on January 25 only 95 members had the right to participate and vote in the joint assembly. Of these Mr. SCOTT received 48, a majority. Therefore the first objection is unfounded.

2. The second objection is that Senators Getzendanner and Pearson, who voted for Mr. SCOTT, had forfeited their seats by accepting commissions in the regiment of State volunteers in the service of the United States during the Spanish war.

These two members were "hold-over" senators who between the session of the last legislature and the assembling of the new legislature in 1899 had accepted, had served under, and had resigned their commissions prior to the meeting of the legislature.

It appears by the journal of the joint assembly that Senators Getzendanner and Pearson were present therein and voted for Mr. SCOTT.

The constitutional provision is that—

No person holding a lucrative office under this State, the United States, or any foreign office * * * shall be eligible to a seat in the legislature.

On January 20, 1899, resolutions were offered in the senate declaring that by virtue of this constitutional provision and the acceptance of said commissions each of these senators "thereby became ineligible and forfeited his right to a seat in this body." These resolutions were referred to the committee on privileges and elections, and on January 23, 1899, that committee reported in lieu of said resolutions a substitute declaring that Getzendanner and Pearson are legally qualified and entitled to hold their membership in the senate, and have not vacated their seats therein under the provisions of section 13 of article 3. The senate adopted the substitute on January 24, 1899.

This judgment of the senate of West Virginia upon the title of Senators Getzendanner and Pearson to their seats therein is a finality. The Senate of the United States can not reverse it. As before said, the State senate is, under the State constitution, "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Such constitutional powers have effect, not only to make the members of each house the judge in each case, but also to forbid that the members of any other tribunal shall be judges thereof to review or reverse such original judgment. The jurisdiction of each of the houses of the State legislature is original and exclusive. (Case of H. A. Du Pont, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 289, page 104.)

The Senate of West Virginia is the only tribunal which could either hear or determine lawfully these objections to the qualifications of Senators Getzendanner and Pearson. Its judgment in their favor is final. The Senate of the United States has not authority to originate, hear, or determine any objections to the qualifications of those who acted and voted as members of the senate of the State. Where the title of an individual member of the legislature who has once been seated has been determined by a subsequent adjudication of the house to which he belongs, such judgment will not be here disturbed or inquired into. (Potter vs. Robbins, Senate Election Cases, 88; Clark and Maginnis vs. Sanders and Power, Senate Election Cases, 652; the case of David Turpie, Senate Election Cases, 625; the petition of H. A. Du Pont (minority report), Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, Report No. 289, pages 98–104; Sykes vs. Spencer, Senate Election Cases, 521.)

It should be noted that the Senate of the United States, in Stanton vs. Lane (Senate Election Cases, 180), upon a similar case came to a like conclusion with the senate of West Virginia. James H. Lane was elected a Senator from Kansas in April, 1861, and took his seat July 4, 1861. It appears that on June 20, 1861, President Lincoln appointed him brigadier-general of volunteers; that he accepted the appointment and qualified to perform its duties, but had resigned the office. The governor of Kansas appointed Frederic P. Stanton to fill the vacancy, but on January 16, 1862, the Senate voted that Lane was entitled to his seat in that body. Of the majority, some held that the office of brigadier-general did not exist on June 20, 1861; others that, although Lane held the office after he had been elected Senator, yet, having resigned the same before taking his seat in the Senate, he did not come within the constitutional provision (Article I, section 6). It profits little here to discuss the reasons or motives of State sentors or of the Senate.

It is well said in David Turpie's case (Senate Election Cases, 625), that—

This body is made by the Constitution the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members. The senate of Indiana is likewise the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We must determine all questions arising out of the proceedings of the electors. But who sustain the character of electors is to be determined by the legislative body of the State. We can not inquire into the motive which controlled its judgment.

The third and fourth objections of the remonstrants may be considered as two parts of the same ground of objection. It is charged that Republican senators in the State senate threatened to unseat illegally certain Democratic senators unless the house acceded to demands (not stated), and did unseat R. F. Kidd, a Democratic senator, in partial execution of these threats; that thereby the Democratic members went into joint convention under duress; that this joint convention was not held under the law, but under a private agreement between the members of the two houses, ratified by both houses; that this agreement was void as against public policy and vitiated the election of Senator SCOTT. That the effect of this agreement was to disfranchise one Democratic senator and one Democratic member of the house of delegates, who, had they been permitted to cast their votes in the joint convention, would have voted against Mr. SCOTT.

It does not appear from the journal of the joint convention that the alleged Democratic senator Kidd and the alleged Democratic delegate Dent were present or offered to vote in the joint convention. Their names were not called. If present, as stated in brief and argument, they appear to have acquiesced, to have waived their alleged right as representatives.

It does appear that the State senate had a Republican majority and the house of delegates had a Democratic majority, and that when the joint convention met that body was comprised of 49 Republicans and 46 Democrats. All of the latter voted for Mr. McGraw; all save one of the Republicans, who voted for Judge Goff, voted for Mr. SCOTT, giving him 1 majority, as stated.

There were contests against sitting members from political motives. One Democrat in the senate, Kidd, had been unseated and a Republican, Morris, seated in his place. One sitting Republican in the house, Via, had been unseated, and a Democrat, Logan, had been seated in his place. Another sitting Republican, Brohard, of Taylor County, had been excluded from participation in the proceedings of the house on January 16, and on January 24 the committee had reported in favor of the seating of Dent in the house.

As the joint convention was to assemble at noon on the following day, it would appear difficult to unseat Brohard and seat Dent earlier the next morning.

At this juncture the Republicans would have had in joint convention 50 votes and the Democrats would have had 46 had the joint convention met without further action in either house.

As a result of conferences among adherents of the two parties, 5 Democratic members of the house, including Mr. McKinney, the speaker, and Mr. Davis, the leader of his party, signed the following proposal, which was thereafter presented to and signed by 5 Republican Senators, including Mr. Marshall, the president of the senate. This proposal, which purports to have been made by Democrats and accepted by Republicans, is as follows:

To the Republican Senators:

GENTLEMEN: In order to bring about a peaceful and orderly settlement of the differences now existing between the two houses of the West Virginia legislature, we submit to you the following propositions, viz:

(1) The election and qualification of the member of the House of delegates from Taylor County, to be heard and tried upon its merits.

(2) The election and qualification of a senator from the Fourth senatorial district, to be heard and tried upon its merits.

(3) These two cases to be finally voted upon in each house on the 7th day of February, 1899, after 2 p. m. of that day, with privilege to any party to take any evidence pertinent up and until noon of February 6, 1899, when the taking of evidence shall be closed.

(4) All contests and controversies as to the membership of each house other than the two above named to be dismissed, and no further contests or controversies respecting the membership therein to be brought or entertained by either house.

(5) Pending the investigation hereinabove referred to, neither Dent, Brohard, Kidd, or Morris shall vote, in joint assembly or otherwise.

(6) All resolutions now pending in either house, looking to unseating any member thereof, or questioning the seat of any sitting member, shall be dismissed.

(7) Each of the signers of this proposition pledges himself to vote and use all honorable means to have the stipulations herein contained faithfully carried out and observed.

O. S. MCKINNEY.
ISAIAH BEE.
W. L. MANSFIELD.
JNO. W. DAVIS.
R. W. MORROW.

We, the undersigned Republican senators, concur in the foregoing proposition.

R. E. FAST.
O. S. MARSHALL.
ALONZO GARRETT.
S. L. BAKER.
S. W. MATTHEWS.

Its first sentence declares its purpose to bring about a peaceful and orderly settlement of the differences now existing between the two houses. It is to be noted that those who are alleged to have acted under duress first signed and submitted the proposal, then those who it is alleged threatened them consented to accept the proposal.

This proposal stipulated that the case of Brohard, Republican, in the house, and the case of Kidd, Democrat, in the senate, shall be heard and tried upon their merits and finally voted on February 7, 1899; that pending the decision of these cases, neither Dent, Democrat, nor Brohard, Republican, in the house, nor Kidd, Democrat, nor Morris, Republican, in the senate, shall vote, in joint assembly or otherwise, and that all contests and resolutions looking to unseating of members shall cease in each house.

The signers pledge themselves individually to so vote and to use all honorable means to have those stipulations carried out. Five Democrats in the house and 5 Republicans in the senate were numerically sufficient to change the partisan majority in either house. As these men included the presiding officers of each house and the floor leaders of the majority in each house, their statement of the spirit and purpose of the proposal of these Democrats, accepted by these Republicans in the paper they signed, should be accepted as true.

In the senate, as a result of this conference, Senator Garrett the next morning offered the resolution postponing the Kidd vs. Morris contest, as before stated, and forbidding further participation of Morris in the voting for Senator of the United States. It was adopted unanimously.

In the house Mr. Davis offered a like resolution, postponing the discussion of the Dent vs. Brohard contest, as before stated. It was adopted unanimously.

Mr. John W. Davis, conceded by both sides to be a man of ability and high character, the leader of the Democratic majority in the house, who introduced the resolution, in a printed deposition (used by both sides in argument before the committee, and so used here) gives his own reasons for signing this paper and declares that the statement he makes for himself was in accord with conversations he had with other Democratic signers at or before the time the agreement was presented to him for signature. Mr. Davis's statement may, therefore, be taken as the statement of all the Democrats who signed this proposal.

Q. What was your understanding of the purpose of that agreement upon the part of the Democrats?

A. That agreement, as I understood it, was entered into for the purpose of avoiding further trouble between the two houses and in each house in regard to contests then pending, the situation having become very acute, rumors being current upon all hands of an intention upon the part of the Republican minority in the house to withdraw and organize a separate house and upon the part of the Republican majority in the senate to unseat various Democratic senators and it being believed that the best interests of the people of West Virginia and the proper conduct of the business of the legislature demanded an early and final settlement of these questions.

In the senate Kidd had been unseated by the Republican majority. In the house Via had been unseated and Brohard was about to be unseated by the Democrats. Other contests were pressed from partisan motives. The pacific understanding of these ten men ended this strife and enabled the legislature to proceed with its business.

There is no evidence of force or fraud in these transactions in the documents or facts before us. The unanimous vote in both houses upon resolutions postponing pending contests for seats disproves duress if the word "duress" has meaning in this remonstrance.

We can not say that such an agreement as this between ten men, and favored afterwards by all members, is "void as against public policy." We can not declare void the unanimous act of the senate or the unanimous act of the house, of like pacific purpose. Nor can we perceive how it "vitiated said election." Its immediate result was not "to disfranchise one Democratic senator and one Democratic member." Its immediate result, if any, was pacific and the subsequent action of both houses had as its immediate result the disfranchisement of Morris, the sitting Republican senator.

As the plan was unanimously adopted in both Houses the members manifestly considered it fair and in the public interest.

Therefore the third and fourth objections have no foundation, and the election of the junior Senator from West Virginia was peaceable, fair, and valid.

The fifth and last objection of the remonstrants is that Mr. SCOTT, at the time of his election, was a citizen but not an inhabitant of West Virginia. I think upon the ground of citizenship the committee were unanimous.

Mr. PETTUS. They were.

Mr. McCOMAS. The Senator from Alabama assures me that the committee were unanimously of opinion that there was no weight or merit in the objection that Mr. SCOTT was not a citizen and was not an inhabitant of the State of West Virginia at the time he was elected a Senator from that State. So the committee unanimously agreed that there was no ground for this objection and were unanimously of opinion that the junior Senator from that State was an inhabitant of West Virginia at the time of his election to the Senate.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator might just as well have said that the committee were also unanimous in holding that it did not require 49 to constitute a majority.

Mr. McCOMAS. I am very glad the Senator tells me that he agreed with the committee in that view.

Mr. PETTUS. I thought it was known at the time.

Mr. McCOMAS. If so, it escaped my attention. The Senator now tells me that in that respect the committee were unanimous, and that disposes of the first objection to which I would not have given the time I have done if I had remembered, what I perhaps ought to have remembered, the statement of the Senator from Alabama.

All of the members of the committee except the junior Senator from Alabama, I am authorized to state, agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That NATHAN B. SCOTT has been duly elected a Senator from the State of West Virginia for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1899, and that he is entitled to a seat in the Senate as such Senator.

I submit that I have stated all the material facts that appear in the record whereon the Senate must determine this question.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama has traveled outside of the record as he is not wont to do. Certain printed copies of ex parte depositions and other matters without verity, except that they appear in the brief of counsel for remonstrant, statements not under oath, not subject to cross-examination, are relied upon in the printed opinion of the Senator. The Senate will not try the right of a Senator to his seat upon the unsupported contents of the brief of attorneys who oppose him.

I will not now follow the Senator so far out of the record whereby we must decide the title of the junior Senator from West Virginia. Upon that record I confidently believe the Senate will adopt the resolution which is supported by all save one of the members of the committee which heard this case more fully than it can now be considered here. In respect of several of the objections the report is supported by the committee unanimously, to wit, the matter of the objection to the majority being 49 instead of 48, and the matter of the citizenship of the junior Senator from West Virginia. And so, Mr. President, with that statement I will not make further remark at this time upon the resolution.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I do not desire to continue the discussion at this time, and I will ask that the resolution go over until morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks that the resolution may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. McCOMAS. Of course if the Senator desires that action, I shall not object. I hoped that we might dispose of it during the day, but if that is the desire of the Senator, of course the resolution will go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none.

STEAMER ESTHER.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Vermont will pardon the Chair, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] was recognized by the Chair immediately before the close of the morning business, and was requested to wait until the business was closed, which he did. The Chair feels under obligation to recognize him.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. McENERY. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 906) to provide an American register for the steamer Esther, of New Orleans.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam vessel, steam boiler, steam pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam boiler, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied to the inspection of said boiler, steam pipes, and appurtenances will be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save the fact that said boiler, steam pipes, and appurtenances, not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States, and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate, if said boiler, steam pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Phœnix, of Norway, purchased and wholly owned by an American citizen, and repaired by him, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for the reading of the report on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. CLAY March 16, 1900, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 906) to provide an American register for the steamer Esther, have considered the same and accompanying papers, and report as follows:

The Esther (formerly the Norwegian steamer Phœnix) is owned by William Adler, of New Orleans, La., a citizen of the United States, who purchased her at public auction while she lay a wreck on False Cape Bank, about 34 miles northeast of Cape Garcius, Central America, for the sum of $2,600. The Esther (then Phœnix) was wrecked at the place named on November 1, 1898, abandoned by her crew, and was not floated until January 27, 1899, when she was raised by a wrecking crew sent from New Orleans by the purchaser.

The vessel was afterwards repaired at New Orleans, La., at an expense of $22,396.41.

As this vessel could be registered under the provisions of the general law with regard to wrecked vessels by reason of the facts as stated, except for the fact that the wreck occurred outside of United States waters instead of within the same, your committee believe that this technical bar should be removed in this case, and accordingly report back the bill and recommend that it pass with an amendment striking out all of section 2, the subject-matter of which has been provided for in the general law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in and to the government of the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that that may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be considered as the bill is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the head of "Department of Agriculture," on page 2, line 9, to increase the number of clerks of class 3 from 2 to 3; in the same line, to increase the appropriation for the salaries of clerks of class 3 from $3,200 to $4,800; in line 10, to reduce the number of clerks of class 2 from 2 to 1; in the same line, to reduce the appropriation for clerks of class 2 from $2,800 to $1,400; in line 23, to increase the number of messengers, at $840 each, from 5 to 6; in line 24, to increase the appropriation for messengers from $4,200 to $5,040; in line 25, after the word "dollars," to strike out "1 coachman, at $840;" on page 3, line 1, after the word "assistant," to strike out "coachmen" and insert "messengers," and in line 3, to increase the total appropriation for the office of the Secretary from $65,810 to $66,010.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 10, after the word "dollars," to insert "for extra laborers and emergency employment, $1,000," and in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Secretary: Laborers and charwomen.—One laborer, at $720; 1 laborer, at $300; 3 charwomen, at $480 each, $1,440; 5 charwomen, at $240 each, $1,200; for extra laborers and emergency employment, $1,000; in all, $4,960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 19, after the word "dollars," to insert "4 scientific aids, at $480 each, $1,920;" and in line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six thousand five hundred" and insert "eight thousand four hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of Vegetable Physiology and Pathology: One pathologist, who shall be chief of division, $2,500; assistant pathologist, who shall be assistant chief of division, $1,800; assistant pathologist, $1,200; 1 clerk, $1,000; 4 scientific aids, at $480 each, $1,920; in all, $8,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, to strike out "The Office of Soils Survey" and insert "Division of Soils;" in line 6, after the word "One," to strike out "director" and insert "chief;" and in line 7, after the word "assistant," to strike out "director" and insert "chief;" so as to make the clause read:

Division of Soils: One chief, $2,500; 1 assistant chief, $1,200; 1 assistant, $1,000; 1 clerk, $1,000; in all, $5,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 9, to increase the total appropriation for salaries in Department of Agriculture from $325,680 to $328,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Miscellaneous," on page 10, line 19, after the word "books," to insert "necessary scientific and other publications;" so as to make the clause read:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: For the purchase of stationery, blank books, necessary scientific and other publications, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, washing, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 25, after the word "statistical," to insert "and newspaper;" so as to make the clause read:

Collecting agricultural statistics: Collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics, compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports; special investigations and compilations; subscriptions to and purchase of statistical and newspaper publications containing data for permanent comparative records; maps and charts; stationery supplies, blanks, blank books, circulars, paper, envelopes, postal cards, postage stamps, freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 24, on page 12.

Mr. PROCTOR. On behalf of the committee, I move, after the word "economic," at the end of line 23, to insert the words "or poisonous;" so as to read:

Investigations relating to medicinal, fiber, and other economic or poisonous plants and seeds, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was, on page 13, line 4, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" so as to make the clause read:

Botanical investigation and experiments: Investigations relating to medicinal, fiber, and other economical plants and seeds, the collection of plants, traveling expenses, and express charges; the purchase of paper and all other necessary supplies, materials, and apparatus; for gas and electric current; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; subscriptions to, and purchase of, botanical publications for use in the division; and the preparation, illustration, and publication of reports, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 4, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the result of such experiments;" and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-two;" and in the same line, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Entomological investigations: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture; ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious, including an investigation into the ravages of the codling moth with a view of ascertaining the best method of its extermination; investigations in apiculture; purchase of chemicals, insecticide apparatus, and other materials, supplies, and instruments required in conducting such experiments and investigations; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses; preparing, illustrating, and publishing the results of the work of the division, $22,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 15, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" and on page 15, line 2, after the word "them," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That $2,000 of this sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the employment of student scientific aids, at an annual salary of $480 each;"

So as to make the clause read:

Vegetable pathological investigations: Investigating the nature of diseases injurious to fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, vegetables, and other useful plants; experiments in the treatment of the same; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for gas and electric current, purchase of chemicals and apparatus required in the field and laboratory; necessary traveling expenses; the preparation of reports and illustrations; the rent of a building, not to exceed $960 per annum, and for other expenses connected with the practical work of the investigation, $38,000, of which sum $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the erection, heating, and equipment of a plant house upon the Department grounds, for conducting investigations and experiments on the diseases of plants and methods of preventing them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 9, before the word "for," to strike out "and;" in line 10, before the word "an," to insert "for;" in line 13, before the word "the," to insert "for;" and in line 15, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for;" so as to make the clause read:

Biological investigations: For biological investigations, including the geographic distribution and migrations of animals, birds, and plants; for the promotion of economic ornithology and mammalogy; for an investigation of the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for freight and express charges; for preparation and publication of reports, and for illustrations, field work, and traveling and other expenses in the practical work of the division, $17,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 24, after the word "for," to strike out "collecting, classifying, and naming cereals;" and on page 16, line 3, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" so as to make the clause read:

Pomological investigations: Investigating, collecting, and disseminating information relating to the fruit industry; the collection and distribution of seeds, shrubs, trees, and specimens; and for collecting and modeling fruits, vegetables, and other plants; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for traveling and other necessary expenses, $9,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 13, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "$13,500;" so as to make the clause read:

Laboratory, Department of Agriculture: Chemical apparatus, chemicals, laboratory fixtures, and supplies, repairs to engine and apparatus; gas and electric current, purchase of supplies and necessary expenses in conducting special investigations, including necessary traveling and other expenses, labor and expert work in such investigations, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments, $4,000; for rent of laboratory building, $2,500; for the employment of additional assistant chemists, when necessary, and for employment of not to exceed four laborers in division of chemistry, when necessary, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 20, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the investigation relative to the various typical soils of the United States, to determine their chemical characteristics and especially the nature of the nitrifying organisms contained therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 18, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and to inspect before shipment, when desired by the shippers or owners of these food products, American food products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before said food products are allowed to be sold in the countries mentioned; and for all necessary expenses connected with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in said foreign countries; for.

In line 10, before the word "preparation," to strike out "The" and insert "the;" in line 15, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-three" and insert "thirty-one;" and in line 20, after the word "dollars," to insert "$2,000 of which shall be immediately available;" so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and to inspect before shipment, when desired by the shippers or owners of these food products, American food products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before said food products are allowed to be sold in the countries mentioned; and for all necessary expenses connected with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in said foreign countries; for the preparation of reports, the purchase of apparatus, chemicals, samples, and supplies required in conducting such investigations; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting such experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for freight and express charges, and for traveling and other necessary expenses, $15,000; in all, for the division of chemistry, $31,500, $2,000 of which shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 7, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "eighty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Of which sum not to exceed $5,000 may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used to investigate the forest conditions in the southern Appalachian mountain region of western North Carolina and adjacent States.

So as to make the clause read:

Forestry investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to experiment and to make and continue investigations and report on the subjects of forestry, forest fires, and lumbering; to advise the owners of woodlands as to the proper care of the same; to seek, through investigations and the planting of native and foreign species, suitable trees for the treeless regions; to collect and distribute valuable economic forest tree seeds and plants; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for the purchase of all necessary supplies and apparatus, for freight and express charges, and traveling expenses, $80,000, of which sum not to exceed $5,000 may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used to investigate the forest conditions in the southern Appalachian Mountain region of western North Carolina and adjacent States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 4, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" so as to make the clause read:

Soil investigations: Investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life; for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field and laboratory; for the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts; the investigation of the relation of soils to drainage and seepage waters, and of methods for the prevention of the accumulation of and injury from seepage waters in irrigated districts; to map the tobacco soils of the United States; to investigate the soils and conditions of growth in Cuba, Sumatra, and other competing countries; to investigate the methods of curing, with particular reference to fermentation; to originate, through selection and breeding, improved varieties of the principal tobacco districts of the United States, and to secure, as far as may be, a change in the methods of supplying tobacco to foreign countries; the location of the stations, and the rent of a building, not to exceed $600 per annum, for office and laboratory purposes; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; the preparation of drawings and illustrations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 24, after the word "grasses," to strike out "and for experiments and reports upon the best methods of destroying prairie dogs;" on page 22, line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty;" and in the same line, after the word "Provided," to strike out—

That $6,000 of the amount hereby appropriated be used to purchase and collect seeds, roots, and specimens of valuable and economic grasses and forage plants, to be distributed to the various experiment stations in the several States and Territories, to be by them used, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, to ascertain their adaptability to the various soils and climates of the United States: And provided further;

So as to make the clause read:

Grass and forage-plant investigation and animal foods, Division of Agrostology: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations of grasses, forage plants, and animal foods; to employ local and special agents and assistants; to collect and purchase seeds, roots, and specimens of valuable economic grasses and forage plants for investigation, experimental cultivation, and distribution, and for experiments and reports upon the best methods of extirpating Johnson and other noxious and destructive grasses; to purchase tools, materials, apparatus, and supplies; to pay freight, express charges, and traveling expenses, and labor required in conducting experiments; to prepare drawings and illustrations for circulars, reports, and bulletins; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in establishing and maintaining experimental grass stations, for determining the best methods of caring for and improving meadows and grazing lands, the use of different grasses and forage plants, and their adaptability to various soils and climates, the best native and foreign species for reclaiming overstocked ranges and pastures, for renovating worn-out lands, for binding drifting sands and washed lands, and for turfing lawns and pleasure grounds, and for solving the various forage problems presented in the several sections of our country, $20,000: Provided, That not more than $6,000 of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended for salaries in the city of Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I inquire if the amendment striking out the proviso on page 22 has been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have some explanation as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be regarded as an open question, if there be no objection.

Mr. PROCTOR. The proviso was stricken out at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture, because the same words were included in another portion of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 24, line 17, after the word "index," to strike out "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture" and insert "And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $10,000 of which sum;" and in line 25, after the word "station," to strike out "$10,000;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $10,000 of which sum to establish and maintain an agricultural station in the Hawaiian Islands, including the erection of buildings, the printing (in the Hawaiian Islands), illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other expenses essential to the maintenance of said station, which sum shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 4, before the word "to," to strike out "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture" and insert "And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $5,000 of which sum;" in line 12, after the word "languages," to strike out "$5,000;" and in line 13, after the word "available," to insert "in all, $780,000;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend $5,000 of which sum to investigate and report to Congress on the agricultural resources and capabilities of Porto Rico with special reference to the selection of locations for agricultural experiment stations, and the determination of the character and extent of agricultural experiments immediately demanded by the condition of agriculture in that island, and to prepare, print, publish, and distribute in Porto Rico circulars of inquiry and bulletins of information in the English and Spanish languages, which sum shall be immediately available; in all, $780,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEY. Do I understand that this is the formal reading of the bill, or is it being read for amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is being read for committee amendments.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 25, line 20, to increase the appropriation for investigation and report upon the nutritive value of the various articles and commodities used for human food, etc., from $15,000 to $20,000.

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me that $20,000 is a small allowance for that item. That is one of the most important things in the bill. The Department is doing good work in that direction, and I think great attention should be paid to those investigations. I think we had better give about $30,000 there, or I will ask if that is all the Department desires? I am not informed in that particular. If I had my way, I would allow the Secretary to have plenty of money for that work.

Mr. PROCTOR. The estimate of the Department was only $15,000. This is an increase and is all that has been asked for. The committee heard from representatives of scientific bodies, and this was all that they asked for.

Mr. STEWART. That is satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 26, line 18, to increase the appropriation for investigation and report upon the laws and institutions relating to irrigation and upon the use of irrigation waters, etc., from $35,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 2, after the word "elsewhere," to insert "and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments;" so as to read:

Public road inquiries: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States; to make investigations in regard to the best methods of road making, and the best kind of road-making materials in the several States; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; for labor, traveling, and other necessary expenses, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and five" and insert "eighty-five;" in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "forty-five;" and in the same line, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred;" on page 28, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-seven" and insert "forty;" in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred;" and in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and five" and insert "eighty-five;" so as to make clause read:

Publications, Department of Agriculture: For the preparation, printing, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports, $85,000; of which sum $45,000 shall be available for the preparation and printing of farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interest of the people of the different sections of the country, an equal proportion of four-fifths of which shall be delivered to, or sent out under the addressed franks furnished by, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, as each Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall direct: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall notify Senators and Representatives of the title and character of each such bulletin, and also of any other publication of the Department of Agriculture not sent to the folding rooms of the Senate and House, with the total number to which each Senator, Representative, and Delegate may be entitled for distribution; and on the face of the envelope inclosing said bulletins shall be printed the title of each bulletin contained therein: Provided further, That all such bulletins included in the quotas of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates not called for on or before the 30th day of June in each fiscal year shall revert to the Secretary of Agriculture, and be available to him, either for miscellaneous distribution or in making up Congressional quotas for the next fiscal year; for the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers, and of proof readers and indexers when necessary; for the purchase of manuscript for publication, and of tools, instruments, and artists' materials; for printing proofs, charts, and maps; for drawings, engravings, photographs, paintings, lithographs, other illustrations, and electrotypes, and for traveling expenses when necessary; for labor, paper, envelopes, gum, twine, and other necessary materials; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $40,000; in all, $85,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I notice in the aggregate appropriation here that the Senate committee have added $82,320 to the House bill, and they have substracted $60,000, making an increase of $22,320. One of these decreases is right here, from $105,000 to $85,000, a decrease of $20,000.

It looks to me, if there is any desire to economize, that this is the place of all places where we ought not to economize. We spend every year some $780,000, I think it is, as to the various experiment stations, $15,000 for each State and Territory, amounting to something like $780,000.

The bulletins and reports which are issued by the Agricultural Department are the concrete or the substance and essence of thousands of experiments at these various stations which are reported to the Department and written up, and the information thus obtained is made available to the farmers of the country.

I need not expatiate upon the importance of the agriculture of the United States, because every Senator knows that our agricultural wealth is the basis of our prosperity and amounts in the aggregate to billions of dollars. When we consider how little the farmers of the country get from the Government in return, I think the little pittance of information which is furnished by these bulletins is the least that should be given them, and I can testify as a practical man that they are very valuable. Very often one bulletin, if it could be spread broadcast over the country, would be worth hundreds of thousands and even millions of dollars. I think this information is so valuable that we ought not to limit it; we ought to encourage its dissemination, and in nowise obstruct or decrease the appropriation. The House has increased the appropriation over the amount given last year.

Mr. SPOONER. How much?

Mr. TILLMAN. Twenty thousand dollars, and the Senate committee has simply restored it to the original amount; that is, to the usual amount. I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to have the committee amendment disagreed to and restore the House provision.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I fully agree with what the Senator from South Carolina says in reference to the value of these bulletins. Heretofore there has been only $80,000 appropriated for this purpose. The Secretary of Agriculture estimated this year for $85,000, and has expressed no wish to have it go beyond that.

These bulletins are valuable, to be sure, in most sections of the country, but there are many members of Congress who do not take their quota. Under the law, after a certain time has elapsed, those which are in the Secretary's hands are reapportioned to other members of Congress who desire them, and thus their quota is considerably increased.

I think the Secretary of Agriculture is fully aware of the importance of these publications, and that we are safe in following his recommendation. The amendment of the Senate committee gives him all he has suggested that he would like.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. President, I want to say that there is no publication of the Government that is so much desired as are these bulletins. I know that the allotment that comes to me as a Senator from the State of Delaware is largely insufficient to fill the demand. I do hope that the broadest sort of an appropriation may be given and that these publications, which help that class of people who are so seldom helped through any legislation of Congress and so little helped by legislation in the States, may have the most liberal aid that can be given by our appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. Of course we do not want to publish any more than are required; but I should like to make this remark in regard to these publications. They are very different from what they were formerly, when there was a good deal of criticism with regard to the agricultural reports. They are now of a very different character. Since we have established these experiment stations in the Department of Agriculture we have information constantly coming from their experiments, which is most valuable, and they are improving agriculture all over the country.

I do not want any more of these publications than enough, but I wish to bear testimony that there has been a great improvement in this Department, and that it is most useful. I say this having some little experience in the matter myself, for I have been reading the reports very carefully. I find the bulletins contain information which is very valuable to the whole country, and those publications can no longer be criticised on the ground that they are of no value. They are every year increasing in value.

The people are beginning to wake up to the fact that the experiments which they have been making or trying to make are already made for them. Thus vast expense is saved and blunders avoided by the information which the people get in these reports. That is one thing that commends these agricultural experiment stations. They are doing remarkably good work, and I hope there will be enough money appropriated to have that work continued. Unless the Secretary says this is all he wants for that purpose, I think we had better adhere to the House provision.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, on looking at the bill I notice that there are only two cases in which there is a reduction of the amount appropriated by the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. I take it for granted when the House put in the appropriation of $105,000 for these publications, and also the other one which follows directly after, that they had reason to think that that amount was needed. The chairman of the committee says that the estimate was less than that amount, the same amount that was put in by the Senate; but it seems to me that if the House of Representatives thinks it is necessary to appropriate such an amount for the distribution and circulation of the bulletins of the Department of Agriculture, the Senate ought not to cut down the appropriation made for that purpose by the members of the House.

I can not say anything in addition to what has been said in regard to the importance of these publications; but I do say that this item in regard to the agricultural reports and bulletins, and the item which follows it in regard to the distribution of seeds, which was also reduced by the committee, are about the only things the farmers ever get out of this Government. They are about all that come to them. It is not much, and I know that it has been denounced as useless; yet the farmers regard it as valuable, and I think they should be distributed to the farmers throughout the country, and I think the most liberal allowance should be made. I do not think, after the House of Representatives, which is supposed to more directly represent the people of the country, have fixed the amount, that the Senate should reduce that amount while it increases a number of others.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the committee will not be agreed to, either as to this item or the one that is soon to follow, in regard to seeds.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I agree with a good deal that has been said in appreciation of the bulletins issued by the Department of Agriculture. So far as I am personally concerned, I regret that more of them have not been distributed, but consultation with the Department of Agriculture, with the Secretary, and with the House committee seems to disclose that the acute appreciation of these bulletins arose mainly after the bill was reported to the House. Heretofore there have been annually large numbers of these bulletins not taken; they have not been distributed; they have not been called for.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that after the 5,000 allotted to me had been distributed by my clerk the demand for them grew to such proportions that I made a request for more, and was notified that they were not to be had.

There may be members from States whose population is mainly urban or manufacturing who do not value these bulletins; but in my part of the country nine-tenths of the people are engaged in farming.

Mr. PROCTOR. I should like to ask the Senator, with his permission, if he did not receive the extra number he asked for?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir; I did not get them.

Mr. WARREN. I think the publications are held for a time, and then, if they are not called for, other Senators and Representatives who ask for them can obtain them.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming on what the Secretary of Agriculture bases his estimate in the distribution of these bulletins to the farmers of the country?

Mr. WARREN. In reply to that, I will state that the Secretary makes no estimate of what the farmers may want. He simply reports how the publications are called for and how the quotas are apportioned to members of Congress. I shall not feel badly at all if the Senate restores this amount, provided the Senators and Members of Congress think they are in urgent request, and that the large number proposed can be advantageously distributed.

But while I am on my feet I want to reply to one remark made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. I sometimes think, being a farmer myself, that the farmers do not get as much through legislation as other classes of people; but I am not willing to go so far as the Senator does and say that these seeds and bulletins are about all the farmers get, because this bill carries a very great deal besides that—for instance, the Bureau of Animal Industry is a blessing and a help to every man who owns a domestic animal in the United States. And there are numerous other substantial benefits of large proportions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right there, if the Senator will allow me, I would tell him that I could distribute 20,000 volumes, and it would be considered by every man who could obtain one as the most valuable book he could get—the book on the diseases of the horse and the diseases of cattle. It is a publication by the very Bureau the Senator has just mentioned. We do not grudge money which has been paid for scientific investigations which have enabled the Department to publish so valuable a book as that.

But the point right here is as to the bulletins in regard to the everyday affairs of the farm, the handling of milk and butter, the best methods of raising poultry, and every possible thing connected with the farm. There are a hundred or more of these bulletins issued and printed and reprinted and reprinted, because they do not lose their value by reason of age. This, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, is an item that is more important to members of the House than it is to members of the Senate.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that a Senator, representing a whole State, can not reach anything more than a small percentage of the agricultural population; but a member of the other House who sends to one man in his district and neglects to send to his neighbor, when he has not got it to send him, is brought face to face with the charge of having neglected and overlooked a neighbor and friend, and afterwards will be injured by not having enough to go around.

Mr. WARREN. I only meant to occupy the floor a moment, and I will proceed, if the Senator will allow me. I do not wish to be put in the position of opposing the distribution of these bulletins as fast as they can be properly edited, issued, and distributed, but I have thought, and I am of the opinion still, that the jump was too large a one from the amount estimated for to the one proposed on the floor of the House, and the House amendment did not seem to provide for the machinery or the expense of getting them out. There is something else to do besides the simple printing of the bulletins. Therefore I was of the opinion that we should cut the appropriation down in committee, and when the committee of conference meets, after the matter has been looked up sufficiently, if it transpires that this great number can be used and that there is machinery and facilities for producing them, I should perhaps want to reach the outside figure. With that view only, and not to repress in any way, and not to take away from the farmers, but simply to move up and forward in a methodical and systematic way, the committee adopted this amendment.

Mr. KENNEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether or not the $85,000 agreed upon by the committee is or is not an increase over what the appropriation was a year ago?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator kindly repeat his statement?

Mr. KENNEY. I ask whether the appropriation of $85,000 as agreed upon by the committee is in excess of what it was a year ago?

Mr. PROCTOR. I can inform the Senator that it is an increase of $5,000.

Mr. KENNEY. May I ask the Senator another question? Will the increase of $5,000 give anything like double the amount of bulletins to be distributed?

Mr. PROCTOR. I can not say just what the increase will be. But if the Senator from Wyoming will allow me a word of explanation, I will say of course there is only a limited number of these bulletins which are desirable in one section of the country. For instance, in the State of South Carolina it may be that bulletins in regard to the enemies of the cotton plant are desirable.

This work has been going on for some years, and these bulletins are reprinted year after year. Now, perhaps a certain percentage of his constituents have been supplied in a brief time; and without this very great sudden increase his constituency will be supplied. So it seems to us better to continue the work with something of an even hand and a gradual increase than to make this great jump.

We believe with the very able and earnest Secretary of Agriculture we have, who surely has shown that at every step he has the interests of the farmers at heart and knows very well their needs, that it was safer to take his estimate and that there will be no doubt but what the wants of the country will be well supplied.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the bulletins which are now being gotten out by the Department of Agriculture are most of them very valuable, and the farmers of the country are learning the value of those bulletins. They appreciate them. Realizing how few of them I had to my credit in comparison with the number of farmers in my State who wanted them, instead of sending them out indiscriminately, I published in the newspapers of the State a list and requested the farmers to select from that list the ones which they especially desired.

If a man was in the tobacco belt, he got only those relating to tobacco; in the cotton belt, those relating to cotton; in the wheat belt, those relating to wheat, and so on. The responses to that publication and the requests showed to what wide extent the farmers are studying the agricultural question from the scientific standpoint and desire to do something more than to move along in the ruts of their fathers; to understand the subject and to farm scientifically and intelligently and get all the information they can.

I have had the same experience that some Senators have had, as has been mentioned. I will send a few of these bulletins to a community, and at once get requests from other farmers that did not get them, saying that their neighbors called their attention to the bulletins containing valuable information and requesting copies. I have received requests of that kind which I can not supply.

It is a small amount that is appropriated here. If we make any mistake, let us make it on the side of furnishing this information. When the information has been gathered at great expense, it costs but precious little in comparison to increase the number of bulletins. The slight increase of cost in increasing the number, after we have gone to the great expense of having scientific men gather the information, is such a small increase in percentage of cost that we should not hesitate to make the experiment, if it is called an experiment. Let us vote the amount the House put on, and see next year whether or not a single Representative or Senator can be found, who does not live in a city or who has entirely a city constituency, who can say that he has not found a demand for every one that was published. Let us try it and see. I know there will not be one left in my State if you double the number, for which there will not be a demand, and a demand from persons who will read them intelligently. The amount is so small compared with the other expenses of the Government, and compared with the expense we go to in order to gather the information and to get it ready to publish, that we should not hesitate to put out this increased number and see whether or not we have published too many.

Mr. President, has any motion been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is a motion.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a motion.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I am a little bit surprised that the Senator from Wyoming should be inclined to cut down this appropriation. Looking over the report made by the chairman of the committee, I find that there has been an increase of $15,000 for the purpose of irrigation investigation. Now, that is an important matter; I do not object to it at all; it is important to his country; but while he is increasing that I hardly think he should cut down or feel called upon to cut down the amount for these agricultural reports.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Right on that point I desire to say that the appropriation of which he speaks is one that carries everything in connection with irrigation with it, including the printing of bulletins on that subject. I do not wish the Senator to understand that I desire to cut down the number of bulletins to be printed if there is demand for them and they can be produced and advantageously used. If that can be shown, I have no objection.

As to the other subject, let me say one word further. Referring to the matter of irrigation, the $50,000 proposed there covers every dollar that is appropriated under the bill for two-fifths of the United States, or, I should say, the whole of the United States, on that subject. It takes in the salaries; it takes in the contingent expenses; it takes in the editing and publishing and mailing, and everything connected with it.

Mr. BERRY. I am not objecting to the increase in regard to irrigation, but I do object that the Senator from Wyoming should take that off this small amount which the House of Representatives has provided for the distribution of these farmers' bulletins and agricultural reports and matters connected with that subject in order to make the increase. I do not object to the increase of $15,000. I presume the committee thought it was necessary, and I have every disposition to vote most liberal appropriations for the purposes desired by the Senator with reference to the investigation of irrigation. I also find another matter there in which this country is largely interested—forestry investigation. That has been increased $40,000, while the other has been reduced.

Now, I repeat that I take it for granted that the distinguished Senators who compose that committee found that these increases were necessary, but I do not think the condition of the Treasury is such that it is necessary to reduce the other item in order to increase these. It is the reduction of the appropriation for these publications to which I object and to one that follows on the next page, where they have cut down the amount to be appropriated for the distribution of seeds throughout the country. I shall object to that reduction when we reach that paragraph in the bill.

The House of Representatives must have had evidence before them that this amount was necessary and that it could be used to advantage in the publication of these bulletins. If, as the Senator says, the Secretary can not use it, he is not compelled to use it. There is nothing in the bill which forces him to expend the entire amount of money. But I do think that the Senate should continue the appropriations made by the House and leave it to the Secretary of Agriculture to make the distribution of these documents and these seeds as the House of Representatives thought it proper to do.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not desire to take anything from the argument of the Senator from Arkansas, but simply to correct him in one matter in which I think he is in error. Every raise or every cut in this bill has been made on its own merits. There has not been a raise of one item at the expense of another. I shall have to resent that charge, because, as every member of the committee knows, each matter was raised or reduced upon its own merits.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am decidedly in favor of an increase of the appropriation for bulletins and for the purchase and distribution of seeds, and for everything, in fact, that may be said properly to go to the information or to the relief of the farming classes of this country. Without any special reference to this bill, which I approve in the main, I desire to say that I think these appropriations that are expended in the purchase and distribution of bulletins—in other words, in the dissemination of information upon agriculture and kindred subjects—can not be too large.

The chairman of the committee, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], made the remark a moment ago that of these bulletins some of one class were distributed in one section of the Union and some of another class in another section. I guess that is true; but even that is wrong.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, as I am more familiar with this possibly than he is, I will say that it is absolutely necessary that the Department should try to cover the entire field. In other words, the agriculture of the Northern States is not altogether similar to ours. We have bulletins on sweet potatoes and cotton, which are peculiarly Southern products, and there are other products of the Northern States which we do not raise at all. There is a bulletin on almost every imaginable subject in connection with agriculture, and a very valuable one, and I should be glad to have a hundred thousand of them for my part to send to the people of my State, and I know they would be very glad to get that many from me alone, much less from the Congressmen.

Mr. ALLEN. I am always delighted to note the superior knowledge of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not mean that in any such sense, but merely as a practical farmer I called his attention to the fact that the geography of the country required this very difference in bulletins of which I have spoken.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps I may remind the Senator from South Carolina that he is talking to a practical farmer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I apologize.

Mr. ALLEN. The apology is accepted.

I was about to observe that I think the chairman of the committee is in error, and I think the practice, if that be the practice, is an erroneous one, to distribute simply bulletins that cover the agricultural subjects of South Carolina, for instance, in South Carolina, and bulletins covering the agricultural subjects of Wisconsin in Wisconsin alone, but there should be a general interchange of these bulletins.

What is grown in South Carolina and how it is grown and whether it pays to grow it or not and how to grow it ought to be known in Pennsylvania and California and Nebraska and every other State of the Union, because it takes all this information to constitute a thoroughly educated farmer. The man who confines his knowledge of agriculture simply to the State or the locality in which he lives can not be said to be a thoroughly educated farmer any more than a lawyer who confines his knowledge of the law to the State in which he lives can be said to be a thoroughly educated lawyer.

Many of these bulletins are extremely valuable. Of course they are like other books; occasionally you may come across one that has no special value. They are like anything else; they have the good and the bad among them; but as a whole they are valuable, and the farmer in Maine who has his peculiar agriculture and agricultural interests ought to know about the agriculture of Florida or any other State of the Union.

Speaking generally, Mr. President, and I speak, sir, with some degree of feeling upon this subject, here is the parent occupation, the occupation of all occupations which if it failed for a year would destroy all other occupations, and it receives less attention at the hands of Congress than any other occupation or any other class of our people. The whole burden of taxation falls upon these people. Primarily everything rests upon the farmer. He is the foundation of all prosperity and all life. We tax him without limit. To-day the farmer of the United States is paying a hundred per cent more of taxes than he was two years ago on everything he consumes, on all agricultural implements. Nails, wire, hardware of all kinds, clothing, everything he consumes of a manufactured character costs him in round numbers a hundred per cent more than it did eighteen months or two years ago. Yet, when we come to bringing this class of people in touch in a slight degree with their Government by remembering them once a year by little packages of seed or a few bulletins, we begin to split hairs as to whether it is wise to do so or not.

Mr. President, if we would increase the appropriation for the bulletins 100 per cent over the amount fixed by the House of Representatives, we would not be able to reach 10 per cent of them. Why not increase it? Why not throw them out broadcast among the farmers of the country in all languages and in all tongues and in all sections of the country, that our agricultural classes may thereby become educated in the best knowledge respecting agriculture and enabled by that means to pursue their occupation with greater wisdom and greater effect and greater economy. Yet we hold out occasionally a mere sop. We talk about armies and navies and commerce, and we appropriate millions and hundreds of millions of dollars for these purposes; and yet when we come to this great class of people, who constitute 49 per cent of our population, we begin to split hairs on the number of bulletins they shall have and the number of packages of seeds they shall have. Such a thing ought not to take place in the upper branch of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, a single word. I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the committee reducing the appropriation placed in the bill by the House of Representatives for the printing of these bulletins. I think there is no publication issued by the United States Government of greater value all in all, and I say of as great value as these bulletins. The experiment stations have been a great success, greater probably in some States than in others. Their experiments are of little value except locally, unless the results of them can be generally distributed and placed within the reach of the farmers of the country. It is a part of the agricultural education of the United States, and there is less likelihood of our wasting money in this direction than in any other of which I know. I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw the Senate committee amendment. Perhaps he does not feel at liberty to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I heartily concur in the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin. I regard these farmers' bulletins as the most valuable publications of the Agricultural Department, or in fact of any other Department, so far as the agricultural interests of this nation are concerned. They are exceedingly valuable. They are appreciated by the people. They are in such form that they can be made accessible to large numbers of people, and they are not so cumbrous but that anyone who gets them will read them through. I hope there will be no reduction made and that the provision as it came from the House may be retained.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the committee fully agree with all that has been said in regard to the importance of these bulletins, but we felt it our duty to stand by the action of the Secretary, believing that his judgment was best as to how rapid this increase should be. It is evident to me that the Senate is opposed to the amendment, and on behalf of the committee I will withdraw it, and that takes with it the other amendment in line 12 and line 13 and the amendments in lines 19 and 20, on page 28.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, yes; those follow.

Mr. PROCTOR. Those follow as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. PROCTOR. They are withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And in those parts the bill stands as it came from the House of Representatives.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 29, line 5, to strike out "seventy" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $130,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, what we have just said about the agricultural bulletins bears with as great or greater force upon seeds. While there has been an impression industriously created in some quarters that a great many worthless seeds are sent out, and in the past it may have been, when we had lawyers in charge of that Bureau, as we did under the previous Administration, under the present practical farmer I think I have had personal demonstration that none but thoroughly reliable and good seeds are distributed; and if Senators will consider for a moment the advantages of having in any neighborhood some new variety of corn or beans or cotton that is superior to the ordinary seed cultivated, I think they will at once see the importance of retaining the increased amount put in by the House. I hope the chairman will withdraw the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, before this amendment is acted on I wish to say just a word. It seems to me—and I believe it did to the committee—that the use of public money for the purchase of mere commercial seeds is not a legitimate one. The great bulk of these seeds are just what can be bought at every corner store in the country. The provision is ample for obtaining rare and valuable seeds and plants, introducing new varieties.

Mr. KENNEY. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. KENNEY. I ask him whether under prior appropriations and the present one, as agreed upon by the Senate committee, the Department is introducing rare and unusual seeds, or whether it is introducing the seeds that are ordinarily purchased in the localities where they are sent.

Mr. PROCTOR. So far as the increase adopted by the House is concerned, it is a mere addition of common commercial seeds, and the provision in regard to the allotment for Congressional distribution shows that. It seemed to me that it is no more legitimate than it would be if we should purchase the tools with which to put the seeds in the ground. Any improved tool might as legitimately be appropriated for, it seems to me; an improved hoe. Possibly the Senator from South Carolina would like an improved pitchfork in his business.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will permit me. I am not aware that the implement which I am charged with using sometimes is at all dull or out of order. I think it is in first-class condition.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am ready to admit that.

Speaking for myself, my own State is purely an agricultural State, perhaps as much so as that of the Senator from California or any other State. It is different from the other New England States in that respect. I have myself purchased additional seed, but I must confess that appropriating money for this purpose I do not consider a legitimate use of public funds.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not prevail. I know that the dealers in seed are in favor of it, but the farmers are very much opposed to it. I have never enough seed to answer half the demands on me. The objection that commercial seed are distributed is not well taken. It is well known, as shown by your bulletins, that it is necessary for the farmer to change his seed, to make experiments with different kinds of seed, and the farmers throughout the country now, to my certain knowledge, are getting these seeds from the Agricultural Department and they are trying them. Very much improvement is made by the improvement of seed. The Department has discovered that by its experiments, and the farmer has not the time nor the means to send for these varieties. It is a great convenience to him and benefits the general public very much.

It is not true that it is useless to distribute seed, because they want variety, and they want to know what kind of seeds will grow best. I have received dozens of letters from Nevada in the last month for different kinds of seed with which to experiment—grass seed, etc.—and they want the seeds that grow elsewhere to experiment with. Nevada is a very good agricultural country. So far as it goes, it is the best in the Union. There is not very much of it: it is scattered. But 1 acre of irrigated land there is worth 5 acres of the best land in the State of the Senator from North Carolina, taking five years' production.

Mr. BUTLER. I will come and see it.

Mr. STEWART. Come and see it. We will show you some of the most beautiful valleys in the United States, and they are productive. The people there want the seeds, and they are writing for them daily, and I am answering their letters the best I can.

Mr. WARREN. Since the matter of irrigation has been touched again, I desire to say that since the reestablishment of that Division in the Agricultural Department the calls do not come entirely from the arid regions for inspection, for improvements, etc. We have had Louisiana, South Carolina, New Jersey, Connecticut, and Wisconsin among the States that last year asked for inspections in their States on the subject of irrigation. So it can hardly be charged that it is a Western and mountain affair, relating only to the arid States.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, referring to the increased appropriation for the investigation of irrigation, I expressly stated that I had no desire to cut down that appropriation; that I had no doubt it was entirely correct; and the Senator from Wyoming is entirely mistaken if he thinks I have any objection to the increase. What I object to is cutting down the appropriation for seed to use the money for the purpose of an irrigation investigation or for forestry or for any other purpose.

Now, one remark and I will not trouble the Senate further. In the matter of the amount to be appropriated for the distribution of seeds, I think the House of Representatives should be a better judge even than the Secretary of Agriculture, although he may not have estimated for that amount because he thought perhaps the House would be unwilling to appropriate it. I want to say, however, for the Secretary of Agriculture, that I know no man in public life who discharges his duty more faithfully or with greater ability than the Secretary of Agriculture, and I have every confidence in his judgment. But in this matter the House of Representatives have appropriated this amount of money to be used in the distribution of seed, and the farmers appreciate it. They get but little out of this Government except the small amount that comes in the way of this distribution, and I think the Senate should appropriate every dollar that the House is willing to give for that purpose.

Mr. KENNEY. If any amount of money is to be appropriated by Congress for the purchase of simple commercial seeds, then I contend that the amount of $70,000 named by the House ought to be adopted, and I hope the amendment agreed upon by the Committee on Agriculture of this body may be disagreed to. If it be simply a question as to whether commercial seeds shall be sent throughout the several States in this Union, then let us have enough to go around and let us not limit it so that there will be demand in excess of what we can supply.

I believe there ought to be an amendment to this section of the bill, and that amendment ought to be that this money shall be applied to the purchase of rare and extraordinary seed and not those that are grown in the several States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me?

Mr. KENNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. If he will look on the preceding page, line 23, he will see that this money is appropriated "for the purchase, propagation and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs," etc., and not the common, ordinary seeds.

Mr. KENNEY. Yes. I wish to say that my experience since I have been in the Senate has been that the seeds, bulbs, etc., allotted to me as a member of the Senate have been of the most ordinary kind, not of an extraordinary kind. I should be very glad that there might be new kinds so as to give an opportunity to the farmers in my State and throughout the country to try something new and out of the ordinary. I am in favor of disagreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and restoring the appropriation to the amount fixed by the House, $170,000.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to say that if, unfortunately, the old system of distributing more or less of different seeds that at one time the country was afflicted with had been continued, I should have been in favor of discontinuing this appropriation. But I am glad to say in recent years there has been a marked change in that respect, and especially under the present Secretary of Agriculture.

Farmers are quick to know whether seed are worthless or whether they are good above the average, and I have heard nothing but praise and expressions of great satisfaction from the farmers since the present administration of the Agricultural Department has had the selection of seeds. They have been of rare quality, so much so that farmers eagerly take the samples that we send them. Take cotton, for instance. I live in a cotton district. They will put out several rows or a patch of cotton off to itself to try the seed that we send, and at once, if it proves satisfactory—and the seed was very satisfactory last year—they want to know where they can get more seed of that kind.

Now, the farmers of this country are experimenting with these seeds from one end to the other, and when they find they have a good one—and they have all been good, with few exceptions, in the last few years—they at once go in search of those seeds and plant that kind entirely the next year. So it is not a matter of using money simply to distribute ordinary commercial seeds.

The Secretary of Agriculture is, as I happen to know from a number of cases, always on a search for improved seeds. If he finds something that is better than the country has known before, he gets it. I know that in my State he was looking for a fine quality of rice that took a premium, and finding out how much he could get, and samples of it were sent to all the rice sections, which will result in an improved quality of rice. I cite that one item as an example.

Under an intelligent management of the Agricultural Department, as we have now, by a practical farmer, this distribution of seeds means much to the increased yield of every farmer in America as soon as he can sample a seed and find that it is better than what he had and knows where to order it. The farmer at his home toiling from morning to night, as most of them have to do, with little time for study or recreation, has not time to go out and search and look over the world for different kinds of seed and find the best quality. He has not the money to buy a dozen different kinds of seed and experiment with them. We send him a small package of seed, he puts it out, he stakes it off and puts the name down and waits to see the result. I know personally that farmers are doing that in large numbers. Then if that produces a better quality than his old seed he at once puts in all of that kind he can get the next year.

Can anything better be done for the farmers in this country for the amount of money expended? It is not a waste of money; it is a wise investment. It is not only doing something to improve the condition of the farmer, but the Government never made a better investment for the yield that the country makes. That, as well as the improvement in the condition of the individual farmer, should be taken into consideration.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, that the matter whether these seeds are rare and valuable may be understood, I wish to state that on page 31 there is a proviso for the use of $20,000 to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, plants, etc. The seeds that are provided for by this increase in the appropriation are contracted for with the ordinary seed merchants throughout the country by advertisement. They are furnished just as they would be furnished to dealers all over the country.

Mr. ALLEN. It is discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture, or not, where he purchase them?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. And he can refuse to purchase them if they are not exceptionally good seeds?

Mr. PROCTOR. So far as the supply is furnished by contract it is ordinary commercial seed. The valuable seeds are procured in another way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PROCTOR. That carries with it other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment in line 8?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes. I wish to propose in behalf of the committee, made necessary by agreeing to the House proposal, in line 6, page 29, to strike out, after the word "than," the word "twenty-two" before "thousand" and insert "twenty-eight;" so as to read:

Of which amount not more than $28,000 shall be expended for labor in the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And in line 8 the amendment should be disagreed to?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; that goes out with the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment in line 8, striking out "ninety" before "thousand" and inserting "fifty" will be disagreed to. The clause will then read:

And not less than $90,000 shall be allotted for Congressional distribution.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, in the appropriation for salaries and expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, on page 33, line 18, before the word "products," to strike out "animal" and insert "farm;" so as to make the clause read:

And the Secretary of Agriculture may use so much of this sum as he deems necessary for promoting the extension and development of foreign markets for dairy and other farm products of the United States, and for suitable transportation of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 34, line 10, to increase the appropriation for the salary for one chief of Bureau from $4,500 to $5,000; on page 35, line 13, to increase the appropriation for salary for one chief mechanician from $1,200 to $1,400; and on page 36, line 7, to increase the total appropriation for the salaries of the Weather Bureau from $152,600 to $153,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 10, before the word "fuel," to insert "for;" and in the same line, after the word "repairs," to insert "pay of firemen, watchmen, messengers, and other;" so as to make the clause read:

Fuel, lights, and repairs, Weather Bureau: For fuel, lights, repairs, pay of firemen, watchmen, messengers, and other labor, and other expenses for the care and preservation of the public buildings and grounds of the Weather Bureau, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 12, to increase the total of the general expenses of the Weather Bureau from $386,000 to $389,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 22, before the words "Secretary of Agriculture," to strike out "Chief of the Weather Bureau, with the approval of the;" on page 38, line 6, after the word "including," to strike out "assistance" and insert "pay of necessary clerks and other assistants;" and in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-two" and insert "forty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

All other expenses, itemized as follows: Maps, bulletins, stationery, and scientific and other publications for stations; and the maintenance of a printing office in the District of Columbia for printing the necessary circulars, weather maps, bulletins, and monthly weather reviews (including the hire of printers, lithographers, and other necessary working force); for traveling expenses; for freight and express charges; for instruments and shelters therefor; for telegraphing or telephoning reports and messages, the rates to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, by agreement with the companies performing the services; for rents and other incidental expenses of offices maintained as stations of observation; for maintenance and repair of seacoast telegraph lines; for river observations and reports; for storm and other signals; for cotton-region observations and reports; for corn and wheat observations and reports; for aerial observations and reports; for supplies for climate and crop services, and for investigations on climatology, including pay of necessary clerks and other assistants and all necessary expenses, $444,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 7, to insert:

The accounting officers are hereby directed to settle all accounts for disbursements from former appropriations for the Department of Agriculture on account of salaries and services according to the terms and conditions of this act.

Mr. PROCTOR. From the committee I ask that this be added to the last line after the word "act:"

Except that no increase of compensation herein provided shall be allowed for the current and prior fiscal years.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from Vermont would explain this amendment. The amendment to the amendment as he proposes it may make it unobjectionable, and yet the amendment to the amendment seems to me to destroy the original text. As the amendment reads it would authorize any increase of salaries contained in the bill to be carried backward until the beginning of time, as I read it. Just as long as any office exists the salary of which is enlarged by this bill that officer can draw back pay. That is the original language of the clause. Now, if the Senator will kindly explain what the object of the clause is, as he proposes to amend it, I shall be glad to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee on page 39 by adding after the word "act," in line 11:

Except that no increase of compensation herein provided shall be allowed for the current and prior fiscal years.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I will state the purpose of the amendment. The accounting officers had objected to the allowance of the disbursements of the Agricultural Department because, in the view of accounting officer, it conflicted with the statute restricting the use of money for employment of clerks and other laborers in the city of Washington. This amendment was drawn by the Department to cure that defect in the past. I will state that the amendment to the amendment which I have just submitted was drawn by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In his view it cured the defect.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course there is no disputing the authority with which the Senator supplements his statement. I do not think the amendment objectionable as amended, being offered for the purpose for which it is offered—that is to say, to enable the accounts to be settled which have already been rendered for services actually performed but without any increase of salaries. The Senator understanding that the Senator from Iowa vouches for that state of things, I make no further objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee to accept an amendment on page 32. I will explain it briefly by alluding to the fact that the cotton crop of the South is prepared for market by being packed in bales which are clothed with jute bagging. About ten years ago the Southern cotton planters had a very lively fight with what was known as the jute trust. The owners of the factories which make cotton bagging formed a combine and raised the price of that article to double what they had been selling it for, which angered the cotton planters to such a degree that they formed a combine against this trust and, by the use of substitutes of one kind and another, largely bagging made of cotton which was much more costly, they for the time being won a victory over this combination, but at present the indications are that the jute trust has revived, and now, controlling and owning all the factories in the United States, there is a large increase in the price of bagging.

With a view to the possible solution of this matter, I want to have the Department of Agriculture experiment with hemp culture in the Southern States to see whether we can not grow something there in a profitable way that will enable us to furnish the clothing for our own cotton bales. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of experimenting with hemp culture in the South.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert as a separate paragraph after the word "available," in line 7, page 32, the following:

Hemp culture: For all expenses necessary to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report on the cost of growing hemp and the best method of cultivating and preparing the same for market so as to demonstrate whether it is practicable to introduce its culture in the Southern States as a profitable industry, $5,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I omitted to propose a committee amendment on page 13, line 13, which I now offer. To strike out the word "twenty," before the word "thousand," and insert "thirty;" so as to make the appropriation there provided $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I move the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, at the end of line 14, it is proposed to insert:

The Arlington experimental farm: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to commence the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experimental farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 18, 1900, entitled "An act to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office," the sum of $10,000, of which $2,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in charge of this bill, will consent to this amendment. It has been recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture. It simply carries into effect the provisions of an act passed at the present session of Congress, setting apart 400 acres of the Arlington estate for an agricultural experimental station. It is to commence the work; and that amount the Secretary of Agriculture says is necessary. I have his letter here.

Mr. WARREN. What is the amount proposed to be appropriated?

Mr. MARTIN. Ten thousand dollars. It may be well to have read the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter referred to will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just returned from looking over the lands of the Arlington estate between the two railroads. I took with me our superintendent of gardens and grounds, as I intend to put the work immediately under his supervision.

It will be entirely practicable to make very great improvements over there and to make those lands very attractive. A good deal of tile must be laid to take away surface water. A good deal of grubbing must be done to get rid of brush, principally black locust. Surfacing must be done where gullies have been cut by the rains. Fertilizing must be done, because the soil is exceedingly poor.

So, if this work of reclaiming that land is to be gone about, I suggest $10,000 for tile draining, grubbing, surfacing, fertilizing, and fencing, and it would be well to make $2,000 of this immediately available.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Hon. THOS. S. MARTIN,
United States Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. The committee make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9824) authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURTON, Mr. MORRIS, and Mr. LESTER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. R. 116) to provide for the administration of civil affairs in Porto Rico pending the appointment and qualification of the civil officers provided for in the act approved April 12, 1900, entited "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COOPER, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. JONES of Virginia managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SENATOR FROM MONTANA.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, there is some defect in a proceeding to which I was a party. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] and I submitted some views as committeemen in reference to the Clark case. Our views were sent to the Printer, but the fact that they were submitted does not seem to appear on the Journal. I ask leave to have it entered on the Journal that two members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections submitted their views in reference to that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator that the views referred to have gone to the Printer and will be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. PETTUS. So I understand; but the Secretary has just reminded me that there is nothing on the Journal to show that fact.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL AT DELAWARE BAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 3639) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay, returned from the House of Representatives in accordance with the request of the Senate. The bill, without objection, will be indefinitely postponed. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to give notice that on Friday next after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419, known as the Alaskan bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Alaskan bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STEWART. I object this afternoon; it is too late to undertake to go into that discussion now. It is not worth while. We had better have a day fixed for it. The Senator from Colorado who desires to make a speech on the bill is not here.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] apprised me of his desire to address the Senate briefly, and in view of that fact time will be saved by proceeding with the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. STEWART. Then I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Alaskan bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask the Senator from Montana to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT KINGSTON, N. Y.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 276) for the erection of a public building at Kingston, N. Y.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Kingston and State of New York; the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

SEC. 2. That proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

SEC. 3. That proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to said proposed sites.

SEC. 4. That if, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they may deem necessary, and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all maps, statements, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

SEC. 5. That the compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 6. That the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEONARD I. BROWNSON.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration at this time the bill (S. 3189) for the relief of Leonard I. Brownson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PROCTOR. I will state that it is a soldier's relief bill, and will take but a moment.

Mr. CARTER. If the bill is very brief and does not lead to discussion, I will yield, but I do not feel authorized to yield further in view of the fact that certain Senators desire to speak on the Alaska bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of a bill, which will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President to revoke and set aside so much of General Orders, No. 21, Headquarters Middle Military Division, dated September 18, 1864, as dismissed First Lieut. Leonard I. Brownson, Company K, Fifth Vermont Volunteers, for absence without leave and for conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and to grant and cause to be issued to him a certificate of honorable muster out of the service as of the date of September 18, 1864; but he shall not be entitled, by virtue of this act, to any pay or allowance.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OGDEN, UTAH.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4200, for a public building at Ogden, in the State of Utah. It is a short bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which will be read to the Senate for its information.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask the Senator to yield for this very brief bill.

Mr. CARTER. I doubt not but that the remainder of the evening might be taken up with these unanimous consents. Certain Senators desire to address the Senate on the Alaskan bill, and I appeal to the Senator from Utah to withdraw his request for the time being, to the end that we may proceed with the Alaskan bill.

Mr. RAWLINS. I will do so.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for the civil government of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I understand that there are three or four Senators who desire to be heard on the pending amendment. I am informed that the Senator from South Dakota desires to make some remarks, and is prepared to go on this evening.

Mr. BATE. I believe I had the floor.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am also advised that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] is ready to conclude the remarks begun by him a few days ago. Will the Senator who has the floor yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to say that several Senators, who are in favor of legislation in regard to the Cape Nome situation along the lines laid down in the amendment which I have proposed, have suggested to me that perhaps that amendment is rather radical in certain respects; and, upon very careful examination, I am inclined to agree with them. I have given very close examination to the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], and I therefore withdraw the amendment which I proposed and accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana, with the understanding that he will insert therein the words "in the district of Alaska," instead of the words "on the public domain;" so as to make it strictly applicable to Alaska.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have no special desire to extend this amendment to the public domain, and in view of the Senator's desire to accept the amendment I offered in lieu of his own with the modification suggested, I am perfectly willing that my proposed amendment shall be amended by striking out the words "on the public domain" and inserting the words "in Alaska," if that will suit the Senator's views more fully.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. CARTER. I will modify my amendment by striking out after the word "location," in line 4, the words "on the public domain," and in lieu thereof inserting the words "in Alaska."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENNEY in the chair). That modification of the amendment will be made.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon of the Chair. We are not going to pass upon that just yet.

Mr. CARTER. It is for the purpose of perfecting the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator has the right to modify the amendment without asking anybody's consent about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification as proposed becomes a part of the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. STEWART. I do not understand that there has been a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no vote at all, as the Chair understands. The Chair simply announces the fact that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has withdrawn his amendment, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has been modified by the insertion of the words named by him.

Mr. STEWART. Then I understand the amendment is simply modified?

Mr. CARTER. The amendment is merely modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has modified his own amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand it is agreed to by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been modified by the Senator from Montana. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana as modified.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I had no purpose of speaking further than I have already spoken on this amendment. I had the floor when the discussion upon this question ceased a day or two since, when we gave way according to prearrangement for other matters to be taken up. I then had about concluded what I desired to say. I shall merely add a word or two and give way to other Senators who may desire to speak for and against this amendment.

It has always been the policy of this Government, Mr. President, to encourage immigration; and not only is that so, but it is the policy of the Government likewise to encourage mining. It so happens that the history of mining in this country shows a large portion of the successful element among miners of this country to have been foreigners; and the Government of the United States, not only seeing that, but finding it to its interests, adopted a policy to extend all the liberty possible to miners of foreign birth.

The intention of the amendment which has been presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and also of the amendment now accepted as a substitute by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is to strike, and it does strike, at the foreigner. If it should pass, the result would be that it would make an invidious distinction, a very broad one, between the rights of that portion of the miners who are aliens and that portion who are natives. That would be unjust to alien miners. We opened our doors to them. They have come and have proven to be the most enterprising class of people we have in this country.

I believe it has been the policy up to this time not only in legislation by the United States Government, but also in decisions of the courts, to give foreigners who are miners every possible liberty that a man could have for the purpose of aiding in the development of the mining interests; and that legislation has come down as late as 1897, when alien miners were put upon a par and given, virtually, equal rights with those given to natives.

I beg to read again that act. Here is the last act of Congress touching this question of the rights of aliens who are miners. It was passed March 2, 1897. It is entitled "An act to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories." It provides as follows:

> This act shall not be construed to prevent any persons not citizens of the United States from acquiring or holding lots or parcels of lands in any incorporated or platted city, town, or village, or in any mine or mining claim, in any of the Territories of the United States.

That relieves the situation, and puts all upon an equality so far as their investment in mining goes and so far as locating mining interests is concerned. That being so, they have gone forward and made their investments.

One point made here in regard to the matter under consideration is that this amendment is retroactive; and it is retroactive at the expense of the foreigner who has sought to develop our mining interests. To do so is wrong in principle as it is in morals, and I think the equities, if nothing else, upon the part of those who have already invested under existing laws by making their locations and in good faith working their claims should be respected and ought to influence the Senate to defeat the proposed amendment.

If the amendment should pass in its present form it would deprive not only the alien miner of his rights in the future, but it would also affect his rights as they already exist. It is retrospective and retroactive; and it is wrong in that as in other respects, and ought to be defeated. To enact the proposed amendment would be a reversal of the policy of the Government. If this amendment should pass, it would be unfortunate, not only as evidenced by legislation, but would also override the decisions of the courts, which is another reason why it should not be passed.

We see, Mr. President, that the development of the mines in this country has been to a great extent by foreigners. I believe some of the most noted characters known to the mining history of this country—and it is a wonderful development—were those who were born abroad. We have had one or two instances here in the Senate. Senator JOHN P. JONES, of Nevada, is foreign born. He is one of the largest and most successful as well as best informed miners ever known to the mining interests of this country.

Then there was Senator Fair, known as "Jim Fair, of Nevada," who formerly had a seat in this Chamber, and who made a vast fortune. Then there were Mackey and Flood and others, born abroad, of extended reputation. All of these men, and hundreds of others, aided in developing our mining industry, were men of great energy and force of character, and brought much success to themselves and prosperity to the country by the development of mines.

I do not wish to strike at them and such as they, who are foreigners, by legislative act when the courts are on their side and the former legislation of Congress is so favorable to the foreigner. We find now that this legislation is proposed because it is ascertained that those men owned some valuable mines that somebody else wants, and they can not be reached in any other way. As the law now is, the alien miner can not be deprived of the same rights which are possessed by natives unless those who would undo them come to the Congress of the United States and secure legislation, and that is proposed to be done in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. It would be to the detriment of the country generally, and to the injury of the mining interests particularly, should the amendment pass, and I therefore hope for its defeat.

The hardy adventurers of the pick and spade ought to have equal rights in mining, as they have had heretofore, which has been the recognized policy of the Government. I see no cause why that policy should be now changed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, if I am correctly informed, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has withdrawn his amendment, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] is now the pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I accepted the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana with the understanding that he would strike out certain words in his amendment and insert the words "district of Alaska," so that it would apply exclusively to the district of Alaska.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to know the form in which the amendment as it is pending now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "location," the words "on the public domain" have been stricken out and the words "in Alaska" inserted; so as to make the amendment read:

> That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as changing the existing mining laws of the United States, but in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location in Alaska any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words "United States," in line 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words "United States," in line 2, as follows:

> But in any suit, action, or proceeding hereafter commenced involving the validity of an unpatented mining location in Alaska, any party alleging an interest in the subject-matter may put the competency of the locator in issue, and the court shall determine whether the locator was a citizen or had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time the location was made.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I do not desire to go into a general discussion of this amendment, but we are evidently here engaged in a very dangerous proceeding for a legislative body. It has become evident that we are trying a cause. I do not think we ought to do it. I think courts were made for that purpose. From all that has been said on both sides it is manifest that this amendment is nothing more or less than an attempt on the part of the Senate to adjudicate very important interests, which the courts of the country are abundantly able to take care of and which they were organized to take care of and decide. If the Senate converts itself into a court for the purpose of trying private law suits, as this is, there will be no end to the business we will have before us, and every man who prefers the Congress as a court will go to it in place of some court organized by Congress. If he can make his selection, if he is sued in one court, or if he has brought a suit in one court and does not like the forum, but thinks he will have some advantage by going into the court called the Congress, he will be certain to go. Such a proceeeding ought to be discouraged in limine. We ought not to decide causes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, as I understand the existing law of the United States, aliens are prohibited from staking a mining claim or pursuing it to patent. This amendment simply allows the question to be tried in the local courts, for the reason that the Supreme Court has decided that the Government is the only person who can complain where an alien has made a location. If the only person to complain be the Government, and the case had to be tried through the local land office and afterwards be appealed to the Land Office here, the mines could be worked out completely before the case was ever decided, and therefore their value entirely destroyed.

I understand that gold was first discovered at Cape Nome by a miner, accompanied by two people who were not miners; that after making the discovery they returned, and that the miner of the party, the prospector, agreed with the other two that they would say nothing about it, but would secure additional supplies and return; that the other two who accompanied him went to a settlement where quite a number of people were living who had been brought to the United States for the purpose of training and caring for some reindeer. These people who were caring for the reindeer had brought their families, and agreed to serve at a certain compensation per month for a certain number of years, and every one of their contracts provided that under certain conditions the United States would pay their expenses and return them to their native country, which was northern Europe.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. STEWART. I want to correct a statement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator can do it after I finish.

I understand that these people were not prospectors, that they were not miners, that they knew nothing about mining, and therefore do not come under the head of that class of people so highly eulogized by the Senator from Colorado. I believe that the American miner should be protected and the American prospector should be protected; but the two people who returned and notified these Scandinavians from northern Europe of this discovery of gold immediately went back and organized a mining district. These Laplanders made very many entries. They covered the whole country, even locating the claim upon which the original discovery had been made by the American miner. Some of them took as high as 40 entries; and under our mining laws a man can take 40 entries. When the miner who made the previous discovery returned, he returned to a camp of gold miners who were located at a point about 50 miles east of Cape Nome, where the gravel was poor and mining unprofitable.

Finding that these people had betrayed him and had gone ahead and organized the district, he notified the entire camp, and all the miners in the camp—and they were miners—went over and occupied the district, restaking the claims occupied by these people and claiming them. Afterwards some speculators, following in their wake, knowing that the Supreme Court had decided that the only person who could complain was the Government, bought the rights of the Laplanders to these claims, and hence the controversy arose.

The speculators knew, of course, that if the case had to go through the Land Office and the Government was the only person who could complain, they could take all the gold out of these placer claims before the controversy would be settled. They knew also that if the Government did complain, the entries of these aliens would be canceled, because they had no right under the law to make the entries. But that made no difference, because the value could be extracted before the controversy could be brought to a conclusion.

So it seems to me the case is simply this: The miners, the actual prospectors, the men who were in that country hunting gold, are in conflict with the speculators who have bought whatever rights these aliens may have, and they certainly should have the right to try the case in the local courts. That is all the change there is in this legislation as presented by the Senator from Montana. It seems to me this is a just request, a fair proposition, and one in the interest of the prospector and one which encourages the men who go forward and endure hardships in discovering the precious metals.

Some people from my own State are among these prospectors who have located in this country, and I have a statement in my hand from a man who has done more than any man I know as a developer of the mineral resources of the West. Many years ago he was a constituent of mine. He has since gone to Cape Nome. He has large developments. He made his own location. I do not think he is interested in any of the conflicting claims. He informs me that he is not. He has made a statement which I believe to be a truthful statement of the situation, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Statement of facts with reference to the discovery and development of the placer mining fields in the Golofnin Bay and Cape Nome country.

In the years 1897 and 1898 three or four California miners, by name L. P. Mordunt, D. B. Libby, L. Melsing, and H. L. Blake, began prospecting in the Golovin Bay country. They made good discoveries on several of the tributaries of Fish River and the Neukluk, the principal discoveries being on Ophir and Melsing creeks. There were no other miners in the district at the time they commenced their operations. During the summer of 1898 the fact that gold was discovered at Golofnin Bay was made known to other miners who were then at St. Michael on their way into the Yukon country. Two or three hundred of these men turned back from the Yukon country and went into the Golofnin Bay district, where they established a camp which was named Council City. The men who did this and who made the original discoveries there were all American miners, using their own money and food and doing their own prospecting. The country owes nothing to any alien or foreigner for the discoveries in the Golofnin Bay district. No reindeer herders in the employ of the United States Government, no missionary supported by some church, no school-teacher under pay from the Government, had anything to do with the discovery and development of that country.

FACTS WITH REFERENCE TO THE DISCOVERY OF THE CAPE NOME DISTRICT.

One of the original miners in that country, Mr. H. L. Blake, a California miner, who had been with Libby and Mordunt and Melsing in the Golofnin Bay country, made the first discovery in the Cape Nome district. This discovery was made in the summer of 1898, either in June or July. On his prospecting trip to the Cape Nome country Mr. Blake had with him Dr. Taylor and one N. O. Holtzberg, a Swedish missionary from Golofnin Bay. These men went into the Cape Nome country in a small schooner, putting in at the mouth of Snake River. He prospected Snake River and its tributaries and panned out quite a little gold on the several streams which he tested.

By reason of not having but a small supply of provisions with them, as well as the fact that there were only three of them there, they did not stop to organize a district. They returned to Golofnin Bay with the understanding that nothing was to be said about the discoveries which they had made and that Mr. Blake would go to St. Michael to procure provisions and attend to some business matters at that point, and that on his return they would organize a party and go back and form a mining district, make the locations, and record their notices. During Mr. Blake's absence at St. Michael, Holtzberg, the missionary, sent word to the missionary at Unalaklik on the other side of Norton Sound, and disclosed to this man, whose name is Carlson, the discoveries made by Blake in the Cape Nome country. Through Carlson and Holtzberg, two reindeer herders, Jefet Lindeberg and John Brinteson, were informed of the fact, and they together, with one Eric Lindbloom, whom they picked up at the mission on Golofnin Bay, were sent to Holtzberg and Carlson to locate the ground which Blake had discovered.

These three men arrived in the Cape Nome district on Snake River in the month of September, 1898, and began their operations by staking one stream after another. These men, during that trip, staked at least 2,000 acres of placer mining ground on the tributaries of the Snake River. They were not miners, had never done any mining or prospecting, and are not entitled to any credit for the discoveries of the Cape Nome district. They got in there through the treachery of N. O. Holtzberg, and the discoverer of that district was not allowed to have so much as one claim on any of the tributaries of Snake River. These three men, after their making the first trip there, returned to Golofnin Bay and organized another party. This second party included the three men mentioned, Dr. Kittelsen, the mission doctor; H. P. Anderson, the mission school-teacher, and a California miner by the name of Price.

These men returned to this district again in October, when they staked all the ground which had been left by Lindebloom and Bryntson. Thus did six men, neither one of whom was entitled to any credit for the discovery, take up and stake all of the tributaries of the Snake River. Much of this alleged staking was done on powers of attorney or alleged powers of attorney. In many instances it is known that these powers of attorney were not genuine but were fraudulent, and in many instances were made out long after the claim had been staked. When Mr. Blake returned from his trip to St. Michael, he learned of what had taken place in his absence. The missionary, Holtzberg, had left the country in September, and the men who had profited by his treachery simply laughed at Blake.

Mr. Blake then disclosed to the miners at Council City the facts of his discovery in the Cape Nome district, as well as the manner in which he had been robbed of his discoveries. There was then a rush to the Cape Nome district from Council City, and many of the alien and power-of-attorney locations were staked over. The miners continued to go in there during the entire winter. The men who had robbed Blake of his discoveries went back to the mission and spent the winter comfortably around the fire, eating Government provision and drawing Government pay, feeding on reindeer meat and having their winter clothing made from the reindeer skin. With the exception of Price, who was a California miner, not one of these men had ever put a pick in the ground or carried a pan any distance for the purpose of trying to develop the mining resources of Alaska.

These men, being in the employ of the United States Government, under an arrangement which can be very well conceived, but which it would be difficult to prove without a thorough investigation by the Government, soon connected themselves with the military force at St. Michael. They were guaranteed the protection of these people, and the petition heretofore printed sets forth some of the acts which occurred in carrying out that protection. They arrested American miners for restaking alien claims; they dispersed miners' meetings at the point of the bayonet, and they posted public notices signed by the commanding officer that no miners' meetings would be held in the Cape Nome mining district. In the month of August, 1898, the United States district judge came to the Cape Nome district, presumably for the purpose of hearing and determining many of the disputed points. No cases were tried. The judge is now retained to try the cases and defend these aliens.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have listened to the arguments in this case for several days. I listened to the eulogy pronounced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] upon the Scandinavian race; and I indorse every word of it. There are no better people coming to America than the Scandinavians; there are no better people to settle in Alaska than the so-called Laplanders, than the people from the remotest northern region of Europe; but these aliens did not come as settlers to the United States or come to Alaska for the purpose of making it their home. They were careful to provide in every contract which they made when they were employed by the United States to introduce reindeer into that country for their return to Europe.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will allow the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I have taken pains to examine the contract. The Senator is mistaken about that proposition. The people of whom he is now speaking came to the United States with this provision in their contract: That when they wanted to return the Government of the United States, if they had not the money—that is the practical effect of it—would give them a continuation of their service until they could make enough money to get back. The Government never agreed to send them back. I have had occasion to look at it, although I have it not with me now. Mr. Jackson handed me the contract the other day to look over, and I looked it over. That is all there is of it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have examined the contract.

Mr. TELLER. If they have not saved money enough out of their wages up to that time they shall have work enough, not to exceed six months, to earn sufficient money to go home, if they want to go. Twenty-three out of some thirty took out their first papers at Port Townsend, in the State of Washington, and the rest of them attempted to take out their papers there. For some reason they were not able to do so, and went up into Alaska and attempted to take them out there. These are the facts. I want the Senate to understand them. This last lot of Laplanders had no contract whatever to go back. They are the only ones who have never intended to go back.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I agree with what the Senator has said so far as it goes, but I have read the contract. The contract provides that if any of these people wish to return they can work six months, be boarded by the United States during the six months, and then for that six months' service the Government of the United States will pay the expense of their return.

Mr. TELLER. No; the Senator is mistaken. The Government is only to give them employment for six months. The Government assumes no obligation whatever to return them. Only one man has ever been returned. He was returned before he got to Alaska because the Government found that he was in bad health, and it sent him back.

Mr. BATE. Not only that, sir, but if the Senator will pardon me, I distinctly understand from what has been said here and I learn from other authentic sources that the Laplanders agreed to stay when they started out. They enlisted with that idea, and promised to remain here and become citizens.

Mr. PETTIGREW. They put in their contract a provision to return——

Mr. TELLER. There have been two lots of Laplanders brought to this country. One set of Laplanders returned, and they had a contract with the Government to return them. That is not the lot that is now complained of. These are the ones who came over when the large herd of reindeer were brought here for the purpose of relieving the miners at Point Barrow; and there is no contract, as stated by the Senator, whereby the Government is obliged to return them at all.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from South Dakota allow me?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have here a copy of the affidavit made by Sheldon Jackson, an affidavit submitted by the Senator from Nevada, I think, in opposition to this amendment, and the language used by Dr. Jackson in that affidavit is as follows:

I found, upon the agreement being translated in this country, that a clause had been inserted that any of the parties desiring to return to Lapland at the expiration of their agreement would be sent back at their own expense.

Or, to quote the exact terms of the clause:

He shall then be at liberty to select between paying his own journey home, or that the Government pay such journey, provided that the respective man for such expense serves six months without salary.

That is the contract.

Mr. TELLER. That is very different from what the Senator from South Dakota seemed to think it is.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all. I reassert that these men were careful to put in every one of their contracts a provision that if they would work six months without pay, except to be boarded by the Government, the Government of the United States would return them free of other expense to their native country. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. TELLER. That was upon condition that they chose to accept that or to make that claim upon the Government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Most certainly. I suppose those who have got these gold locations, if they can hold them in violation of our law, will probably remain at least until they work the claims out.

These people did not come to America for the purpose of settling in Alaska and making it their home. They came for the purpose of securing the $23 a month which the Government was to pay them as salary, and they especially provided that if they wanted to they should be returned to their own country. After they had taken these mining claims, they returned to the camp where the reindeer were kept, on Golofnin Bay, and spent the winter in comfortable quarters and drew their salary. In the meantime these American miners, who were in that country searching for gold, and who had tramped the frontier all their lives, many of them, knowing that these aliens could not hold a mining claim, went and staked over the same ground. Speculators came along, and they know also that an alien can not hold a mining claim. They know also that under the decisions of the court if they can get the aliens' rights they can work out the mining claims and make them worthless, and therefore they propose to invest their money and take their chances.

Under these circumstances, I am for the American miner, for the prospector, for the man who takes upon himself the hardships and difficulties and exposure of that cold country and of the frontier, far beyond the confines of civilization. Let him try his case primarily. Therefore I favor this amendment. There is nothing to it but that he shall be allowed to go into the courts and settle the controversy; and that is what I want to do. That is what I believe is just and right and proper in this connection. I do not desire to discuss the question further.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it may be well to correct the statement of facts for just a moment. I will not make a speech. The Senator from South Dakota is away off on his facts, these general, rambling facts. A Robin Hood or some kind of a story about somebody else being up there before was first exhibited here in a pretended memorial to the President of the United States as if there was any reality in it. It is dated Council City, Alaska, May 25, 1899, and is addressed to the President of the United States. The relators are the president and a secretary of a law and order organization situated at Council City, some 80 miles away from the place, and they tell a long story here; but no one knows or pretends to say that he knows the facts therein stated. This memorial to the President appears never to have gone to the President, and the Secretary of War says that he has not had it. If there had been anything of the kind presented that was so important, it should have gone there. The letter from the Secretary is dated April 20, 1900, and is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 20, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 21, inclosing Senate Document 272, inviting attention to page 10, on which is printed a memorial addressed to the President of the United States from citizens of Council City, Alaska, and asking whether a copy of the memorial is on file in the War Department, and in reply I beg to inform you that a careful search of the records of the War Department fails to result in the finding of the memorial referred to.

Very truly, yours,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART,
United States Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that that is the same memorial which the Senator from Montana had read?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; it is the same memorial that the Senator from Montana had read, and the same memorial upon which all these pretended facts are based. It is in harmony with the statement in the affidavit that was presented just now. We find that the clerk who makes a note of every document that is sent to the President did not have it there. The memorial did not go to any of the executive officers.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. The point about the memorial is that somebody had to be there before to know something about it. If they had been there, of course they would have located claims, and so there is nothing in it. I do not believe a word of it. There is no person who was there and who could know something about it who has ever made any statement. The man who was there first has not said anything about it except that this is all hearsay. This is immaterial, only it shows the straits to which men are driven when they are trying to get other people's property.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STEWART. No; I do not yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Just for a question.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to ask the Senator how he accounts for the statement which the Senator from South Dakota had read, which conforms very accurately to the memorial and to the report of Major Ray to the War Department which was read the other day?

Mr. STEWART. I account for it on the palpable fact that all those who pretend to know anything about it tell a story. They were not there. They do not say where they were. They do not pretend to have been there. It is bosh. We present a statement from men of character who were there—six men who were there and made the discovery—the first men who located the claim.

Mr. BATE. Who organized it.

Mr. STEWART. Who organized it and located it. Here is the affidavit of Albert N. Kittelsen, a reputable man, the recorder of the district, who has been there all the time:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Albert N. Kittelsen, M. D., being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States—and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896; that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898; that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten to fifteen years; the third was a Norwegian.

Not a foreigner—

Not a Laplander. The three first who went there were Swedes and Norwegians.

Two other persons went there with me; one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen.

Those who went with him. Those who preceded were Swedes and Norwegians, persons who had been in the country a long time and had declared their intention to become citizens.

The Laplander had declared his intention to become an American citizen in the early spring of that year—

Six months previous to this location—and his declaration was filed before L. B. Shepherd, who was a United States commissioner at St. Michaels. The six persons who were then at Cape

Nome located claims; some of them had located previous to our arrival. We then formed a mining district and adopted rules and regulations under the laws of the United States. I was elected recorder.

These are men talking who were there. Here is a reputable man, and nobody questions his statement:

A few weeks after that miners from the surrounding country commenced coming in, and during the following winter the number rose to between 200 and 300. I recorded all their claims, and in every sense was recognized and acted as mining recorder. The first Laplander located three good claims—one for himself, one for his brother, and one for an associate, who arrived soon after and took possession and worked the claims. These Laplanders worked their claims during the working season of 1899, and sold out to Mr. Lane in the fall of 1899.

One Norwegian located claims on about six different streams, and has been in possession of them ever since. The claims of these Laplanders, while they were in possession and working them, were located by other persons called "jumpers."

Later on the claims of the Norwegian were relocated by "jumpers" and recorded by me, because it was my duty to record all claims presented for recordation. I was so instructed by the judge of the district court.

In the summer of 1899 three lawyers located themselves at Cape Nome, whose names were Hubbard, Beeman, and Hume. These relocators, although they did not take possession or work upon the claims they relocated or "jumped," employed Hubbard, Beeman & Hume as their attorneys. Mr. Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, an attorney for the relocators, is in the city of Washington. I met him on the 5th of this month in the committee room of Senator HANSBROUGH.

I have no interest whatever in any of the "jumped" or relocated claims, either as original locator or relocator, and no private interest that would be affected by any of the proposed legislation.

ALBERT N. KITTELSEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of April, 1900, at Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELKANAH N. WATERS, Notary Public.

Here is another gentleman who is a trader up there. He tells who he is and where he has been. It ought to be known that these men were never up there and that they get up this kind of stories. They claim to have presented a memorial to the President of the United States which they never presented it to him:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

John A. Dexter, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That I am an American citizen; 45 years of age; and was born in Richmond, Va. I have resided in Alaska for the past ten years. This is the first time I have left there during that time. My business in Alaska has been merchandising, having stations along the coast of Bering Sea, at St. Michael, Unalaklik, Norton Sound, Golofnin Bay, Cape Nome, and Fort Clarence. I established trading posts at these places with the Indians to buy furs. I have native agents at each of these places. I visited all of these points five or six times each winter in the course of my business. It was known from the first that there was gold along the shores of Bering Sea at various points, but it was not known that it was in sufficient quantities to pay for working until within the last two years.

There were several parties of prospectors fitted out at my store who went up and down the coast, but none of them found mines which they located previous to the fall of 1898. The first locators were Eric O. Lindblom, ——— Hagaline, and Jaf Lindenburg. They got their supplies at my store and they told me they were going up the coast prospecting. After these three men went there first and made their locations they returned for more supplies. They shortly afterwards went back, taking with them Dr. A. N. Kittelsen, Gabriel W. Price, and a Laplander, Jo Hahn, who had declared his intention in April, 1898, before United States Commissioner Shepherd, to become an American citizen. These six men organized a miners' district and made rules and regulations in compliance with the laws of the United States. I knew them all well. They were all citizens of the United States except the Laplander, who had in good faith declared his intention to become such before a United States commissioner. They all made my stations their headquarters, and I knew all the Laplanders well. They were industrious, sober men, and said that they had come to make that country their home.

I went to Nome in November, 1898, and made some locations myself. Everything was proceeding orderly, and Dr. Kittelsen was the duly elected recorder. A large number of people came there during that winter and located claims. Mr. Price, one of the original locators and organizers of the district, who went there with the first party, notified the people of Council City, about 80 miles from Nome, that good diggings had been struck at Nome.

Mr. Price notified them of good diggings and they went there. They were neighborly, and they notified them that good diggings had been discovered at Cape Nome.

Large numbers of people soon came over from Council City.

That is where the memorial issues from.

Some of the emigration during the winter located claims for themselves and some jumped claims that had been located by the original parties who discovered the mines, on all sorts of pretexts, viz, that the notices were defective, the claims were not in proper shape or size, etc. There was nothing said for a long time about any of the original locators being aliens. Nearly all the jumpers were men who had been dealing with me for some time. Many who came to Alaska represented English and other foreign companies.

You see they talk about aliens there. There was only one man who was an alien of the six who made these locations that all this trouble is about, and he had declared his intention in good faith. But here we have all this roundabout story about aliens.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator, then, if this amendment will harm those people who were not aliens? We do not want to harm anybody.

Mr. STEWART. This amendment would not have come here if some man had had a good claim.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If they were not aliens, as you say they were not, the amendment does not harm them.

Mr. STEWART. These Laplanders went up with the first party and located two good claims on two different creeks and sold them to Mr. Lane, and you want to take advantage of the fact that he made a mistake before he made his declaration. There is the trick in it. There is always a "nigger in a wood pile" when there is such exertion made as this to pass a retroactive law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. How about the exertion on the other side?

Mr. STEWART. There is an exertion to defend rights; and when you attempt to pass a retroactive law, there should be somebody here to oppose such a law and to denounce it. This should not be attempted here, and there ought to be indignation on the part of somebody. Nobody with a just claim is asking to have the laws changed. But somebody wants to get another man's property. Let these things alone as they are; let the courts decide them. I know Mr. Lane and other citizens up there. They are honest men, friends of mine and friends of everybody who is good and honest. There is no reason why they should have their property taken from them on a false pretense.

George Gardner was the agent of the English company, and as such grub-staked many of the jumpers at Cape Nome.

That is, the Englishman would grub-stake them. He would have to furnish them with money to go out prospecting.

Mr. BATE. Will you explain grub-staking?

Mr. STEWART. Grub-staking is where you start a man with tools and grub to go prospecting, and he goes out for that purpose.

The jumpers did no work on the claims because the original locators were in possession and would not allow them to enter on the claims. They simply recorded them in the recorder's office. I have seen the petition or memorial of the so called "Law and Order League" of Council City.

That is the one it was said had been sent to the President, but it did not go there.

Nearly all the signers are Council City men, and most of them belong to companies sent out from London, Chicago, San Francisco, and other places to locate claims. I know that some of the signers of the so-called memorial belong to the English company represented by Gardner, and that many of them were foreigners who had declared their intention to become American citizens before the United States commissioner, Judge Shepherd, the same officer before whom some of the Laplanders made their declarations.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that the men who present this memorial are the same men who took the oath?

Mr. STEWART. They are the same men who have taken the oath there.

I know these facts of my own knowledge, and have seen the grub-stake contracts between Gardner, agent of the alien company or syndicate, and the jumpers. A large number of the signers of the memorial or petition are aliens. If there was a "law and order league" in existence at Council City, Alaska, I never heard of it before I came to this city.

Mr. BATE. He was living there?

Mr. STEWART. He was living there, a merchant. They all came there and traded with him.

I do know that no such league ever existed at Cape Nome or ever assisted in maintaining the laws in Alaska. When navigation opened in the spring, about the last of June or the 1st of July, about two or three thousand people came into Nome. They declared that everything that had been done was illegal. They were a turbulent set of men, not miners, but many had the reputation of being professional agitators. They called a meeting to change the mining laws, after they had stationed men all over the district to relocate the claims after the meeting had abrogated existing locations. After the meeting assembled and its purpose was made known, Lieutenant Spaulding, of the Army, dispersed it to avoid what would necessarily have led to bloodshed if persisted in, because it was well known that the miners would not give up their claims without a fight. Lieutenant Spaulding told them that they must wait until the courts decided in their favor before they took possession of claims which other people had located.

JOHN A. DEXTER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of April, 1900.

[SEAL.] HARVEY T. WINFIELD, Notary Public.

Such witnesses would be competent to testify in a court, but this round-about story should not be listened to by anybody. There are other matters connected with this question, but I think the Senate has heard enough for to-day, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think we had better adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to call up a bill that will give rise to no discussion?

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

EDWARD KERSHNER.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2960) for the relief of Edward Kershner.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint Edward Kershner as a medical director in the Navy, to take rank at the foot of the list of medical directors, and the list of medical directors on the active list of the Navy is hereby increased to sixteen as long as said Edward Kershner remains thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota to have a message from the House of Representatives laid before the Senate?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield for that purpose.

LOOSE LOGS AND RAFTS ON RIVERS, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9824) authorizing the Secretary of War to make regulations governing the running of loose logs, steamboats, and rafts on certain rivers and streams and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. NELSON, Mr. MCMILLAN; and Mr. BERRY were appointed.

MILITARY OFFICERS IN CUBA AND PORTO RICO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 21st instant, certain information relative to whether any officer of the Army of the United States who is now, or who has been, on duty either in Cuba or Porto Rico since the date of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain has received any compensation for any service of any kind whatsoever other than the compensation to which such officer of the Army is, as such, entitled by law to receive as his salary and allowance, etc.

If there be no objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. BACON. Let it lie on the table, if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the communication will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota moves——

Mr. PETTIGREW. I renew my motion, then, to adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota for the purpose of making the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 26, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 25, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a matter of privilege. I hold in my hand the certification of the result of a special election held in the State of Utah on the 2d day of this month for Representative in this Congress. The gentleman bearing the certificate is present, the Hon. William H. King, who has heretofore served with many of us in the House of Representatives, and I ask that the certificate, which appears to be regular in form and issued by the proper authority, be read, and that the gentleman be sworn in as a member of this House from the State of Utah.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the credentials.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

I, James T. Hammond, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that on Monday, the 2d day of April, A. D. 1900, at the special election held within and for said State, William H. King was duly elected Representative to the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the State of Utah, as appears from the returns of said election, which have been duly canvassed and certified.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 20th day of April, A. D. 1900.

[SEAL.] J. T. HAMMOND, Secretary of State.

Mr. King thereupon appeared at the bar and the oath was administered to him by the Speaker. [Applause.]

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to: and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DALZELL in the Chair, for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10301, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I understood we had reached the pneumatic-tube proposition when we adjourned. I will inquire of the Clerk what part of the bill he is reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had just finished the pneumatic-tube paragraph yesterday.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It was agreed, Mr. Chairman, that we should have two hours' debate upon this paragraph.

Mr. LOUD. The parliamentary status was that the Clerk had completed the reading of the pneumatic-tube paragraph, and a point of order was made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], which was pending when the House adjourned, as the RECORD shows.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that at the request of several members who oppose this paragraph I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his point of order. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to control the two hours set apart for debate on this paragraph.

Mr. MOON. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in the beginning of this debate I will say that in my view of the postal service none of us desire to oppose any practical measure which will materially contribute to facilitate the mail service in the United States; but I believe that we can do that service insufferable harm by permitting certain projects and systems to be ingrafted upon the postal service which will prove an embargo on the service and bankrupt the service, as far as that is concerned.

Now, this pneumatic-tube service, in my opinion, contributes to facilitate the mail in such a small degree as to render its continuation or enlargement not the best thing to do. We have already 8.5 miles of this service, as I remember, and we are paying for that service annually a rental of $27,250 a mile.

After long and continuous hearings before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and carefully considering that testimony, I have been unable to find from that testimony where it materially facilitates the transportation of the mail. I find that in the passage of the mail where these tubes are established, say a distance of a mile, the wagon service is continued, and the wagon will make the trip in twenty minutes, as often as the service requires. It is claimed at some places that it facilitates the mail ten minutes, others fifteen minutes, twenty minutes, and the largest is thirty-five minutes. The truth is that when the mail is first received at the depot, they can begin to send it to the principal office, and the first delivery of the tubes will arrive there a considerable time before the wagon mail could. But the wagon can deliver the mail in from ten to twenty minutes at almost every station in the service.

If the Government be called upon to continue to pay the enormous prices it is now paying for this service, I believe it to be an outrage on the people and a disgrace to the service. Take the city of New York; in that city alone we are paying to-day for an 8-inch metal tube buried in the ground a rate of $37,738 per mile per annum rent. Now, that tube ought to be put in the ground for $2 a foot, which would be an enormous price for the laying of these pipes. And yet we are paying the enormous price, on an average, of $22,500 per mile, or $225,000 a year for 8.5 miles of this service. The service does not undertake to handle the paper mail, nothing outside of the first-class matter, and handles only about 80 per cent of that. But little of the paper or bulk mail ever sees these tubes. There is no material decrease in the wagon service.

Yet we are called upon to pay this price, which, if we extend the service throughout the cities of the country, will amount to untold millions, and, in my opinion, will not very materially facilitate the service. I believe the time has come when Congress ought to take a backward step on this proposition, if it can be called a backward step. It is a step in the direction of economic and honest administration of postal facilities. I believe, nay, I am sure, we ought to strike the appropriation from this bill. I believe that in doing this we shall relieve the mail service from a fungus growth that promises to bankrupt that service.

It is claimed that the use of this service will increase the amount of first-class matter. A similar claim is made on every proposition. It is advanced by the friends of second-class mail matter; it is claimed as one of the results of rural free delivery. The advocates of each scheme in its turn claim that the adoption of that particular scheme will largely increase the revenues of the Department.

Legislation adopted by Congress in 1898 provided that no additional appropriation should be made to extend this service until authorized by law. In view of that provision of law, I interposed yesterday a point of order against this provision of the pending bill; but the opponents of this service, as well as its friends, believed it ought to be discussed in this House, so that the judgment of the House might be obtained upon it, and for this reason I withdrew the point of order. But if appropriations for this purpose are to be continued, I believe we ought to strike this appropriation from the bill and provide for the service by general legislation in such a way that the interests of the Government may be properly guarded and the expense of the service properly limited. But, under the present circumstances, to pay the sum of $27,000 a mile on a general average, or $37,000 a mile in some cities, for the use of this service is, I believe, an extravagance which we can not be justified in supporting.

I am willing to extend to the cities and the towns, as well as to the people of the country districts, every reasonable facility for handling their mails; but I can not justify myself in supporting this measure for the benefit of places which already have deliveries six, eight, or nine times a day.

If the apparatus for carrying on this service was a great expensive machine, greatly facilitating the mails, we might justify ourselves in some degree for this large expenditure; but this service requires, as I understand, simply a cast-iron pipe—I presume it is cast iron—8 inches in diameter and laid in the ground as you would lay a water pipe. To charge for a service requiring this simple machinery $37,000 a mile, or $225,000 for 8 miles, is, I believe, wholly unjustifiable. I do not believe this measure facilitates transportation of the mails in any degree comparable with the price demanded. If Congress wants to go farther in this direction, I believe we ought to call a halt on appropriations of this kind and adopt general legislation on this subject, to the end that the interests of the Government may be subserved and the service be properly cared for. I hope the appropriation will be denied.

Mr. Chairman, I return the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] will now use some of his time.

Mr. LOUD. If anyone on this side wants time, I am perfectly willing to yield it, but at present I have no applicants for time, and when I talk myself it will be to conclude the debate.

Mr. MOON. Then I will yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. LOUD. I find there is a gentleman on our side who desires to occupy some time. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the pneumatic-tube service is of particular interest, in the first instance, to the cities. Yesterday the House passed an item of $1,750,000 for the purpose of extending the rural free delivery. To that I make no objection. If it is possible to carry out that experiment in such a way as will conduce to the best interests of the Government and the people, so that we may have free rural delivery in various parts of the country or throughout the country, I shall be in favor of it.

But I want to call the attention of those gentlemen who are interested in rural free delivery to the fact that it is paid for by the receipts of the city post-offices. In no place where rural free delivery has been put in operation do the receipts pay the expenditures for that service, not to mention the other expenses in connection with the mail matter.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the city which I in part represent the postal receipts turned in to the Government as net receipts exceed several million dollars. In 1891 the receipts at the post-office in Chicago were $3,126,000. Last year they amounted to $6,352,000, having more than doubled in eight years; and nearly or more than one-half of this $6,000,000 was net receipts turned in to the Government for the general use of the Post-Office Department. It is true that a large share of that money is used for the expedition of mails by railroad routes and elsewhere; but it is also true that the cities turn in net revenues, which are used for the benefit of the rural districts in the expedition of the mails; and I insist it is only fair that in the experiments being made by the Post-Office Department those cities which turn in such vast amounts of revenue should have their share in the results of the experiments.

It is probably true that the pneumatic-tube service is more or less an experiment. I can not speak of that service in Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, but I know that in the city of Chicago it would be of great benefit, not only to the people, but to the service itself. And as I understand it, sir, it is not the purpose, if this item should be passed in the bill and any portion of it is set aside for use in the city of Chicago, it is not the purpose to use the service for the transmission of the mails between the main post-office and the various railroad depots in the city. Chicago is so situated with reference to the depots of the main lines of the railroads centering there that most of the depots are but a comparatively short distance from the main post-office of the city, and it may be true that this would not very much expedite the transmission of the mails between the post-office and the railway stations in that city; but it is also true that the great city of Chicago, covering a vast territory as it does, has many local centers where immense business interests are carried on, where vast interests are concentrated.

I might mention, or call the attention of the committee to the fact, that a vast business is transacted at the Union Stock Yards at Chicago, which has its own postal station. It now takes from one to two hours to transmit mail from the general post-office to the stock yards or from the stock yards back to the general office. If the pneumatic-tube system were inaugurated there and operated, the transmission of first-class mails would necessarily be greatly expedited between these points. It would be of immense value to the people doing business at the yards and with the city of Chicago, as well as those persons connected with that business in the surrounding country, because it must be remembered that these stock yards represent a very large amount of the business interests in the Western country—the Western farms and the farmers as well as the business men generally of the Western country—and it is to their interest that the mails shall be transmitted with as much expedition as possible between these points.

I might also cite the fact that the banking interests are largely collected in the center of the city, and other business facilities, to a large extent, are concentrated at the central points in the city, and it is necessary for the proper transaction of the business that the mails shall be expedited so that a letter can go from the general post-office to the stock yards and to other local centers in the city and an answer back again in a short time, not exceeding, say, a half hour, where, as now, it sometimes takes a day, and not infrequently a day and a night to perform the journey.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, therefore, that while the Post-Office Department is making some of these experiments for the purpose of adding to the expedition of the mails in rural districts, it might be well to enact a provision by which the pneumatic-tube service could be put in operation in the great city of Chicago, as manifestly so many interests there demand expedition in the mail service.

A few years ago the city of Chicago granted a franchise for the pneumatic-tube service, in connection with the Associated Press of the city of Chicago, to connect it with the various newspaper offices in different parts of the city. At the time it was said by people on the outside, it was said in the city council, of which I happened then to be a member, that it would be of doubtful benefit. I have had a conversation recently with Mr. Addison C. Thomas, the superintendent of the Associated Press in that city, and who has had an extensive connection with that service, who informs me that it has proved of great service to the various newspapers and the Associated Press in the city, in the expediting of the news furnished by the Associated Press, and in the transmission of news to the various newspaper offices. He informed me that in a very short time—almost instantly—they can send news dispatches to or from the newspaper offices in the city. It is very much more expeditious than the telegraph service, because they can handle the business more rapidly than it was formerly done by wire. They transact the business so readily and so rapidly by this system that it would be absolutely impossible to carry on the business satisfactorily without it. The same would be equally true as applied to the business of the Post-Office Department.

It is impossible in the city of Chicago and elsewhere throughout the country, in the larger cities, to send a letter from the general post-office to the outskirts of the city, or even to the inside local centers of the city, within anything like a reasonable time. In our city, which reaches, from end to end, a distance of from 30 to 40 miles, we are absolutely without proper mail facilities or service in this regard. The revenue that we pay for the postal service of Chicago—the immense amount paid annually there—goes for the benefit of other parts of the country instead of our own. Now, why is it not fair that we should have a little of our own revenues to develop our service and provide for the accommodation of our own people?

I will say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that if these experiments are to be continued in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn, it should also be extended to Chicago and to the other large cities of the West.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes now to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the proposition contained in this bill, and to which the attention of the committee is now directed, is a very innocent looking one. It is of very little importance whether we increase this $115,000,000 appropriation bill by another half million of dollars, as proposed, or not. But as I took occasion to say recently on the floor of the House, I warn this committee that if we take the step we are asked here to take in connection with the pending bill, that it is not a question of a half million dollars expenditure, or of $1,000,000, but that it will be in the future, and the very near future, a question of many millions of dollars annually added to the already swollen expenditures of the Post-Office Department of this country.

When we consider that in the last ten years that great cooperative undertaking of the people has run behind more than $110,000,000, and when we consider that this bill, for the first time and the first among all appropriation bills, proposes to expend the public money in sums in excess of those demanded by the Post-Office Department, it is our duty to pause long and to consider well before we travel further in the pathway which is proposed to us.

Mr. Chairman, let us consider for a moment what we spend for the transportation of mails. I will not weary the committee by a recital of figures, but I will place them in my remarks in the RECORD.

For transportation of mails.

Paid other agencies:
Star routes	$5,240,000
Steamboats	545,000
Railroads	33,870,000
Railway post-office cars	4,561,000
Street cars	350,000
Special facilities	196,238
Total	44,762,238
Our own agencies:
Mail messengers	950,000
Pneumatic tube	725,000
Wagon service	750,000
Railway Mail Service	9,761,300
Total	56,948,538

The bill appropriates, in round numbers, $57,000,000 for the mere transportation of the mails, without taking into account many items of appropriation for the purchase of material which is used only for that purpose.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman had better segregate the items. He has got that total pretty high.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. No; I have not.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If my colleague will permit me, I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman state to the House what the demand for mail facilities is in the United States and how that increase is carried along in comparison with the increased expenses? Let us hear both sides of it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Oh, everybody knows that the demand for the privileges of mailing have increased, and increased greatly, but that does not relieve us from the duty of conducting the business of the Post-Office Department upon business principles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the House while I undertake to show how this ill-begotten appropriation began. I think it will be a warning to us to proceed with caution. Let me have your attention for but a few moments upon this proposition.

Mr. LOUD. Has the gentleman any objection to an interruption there?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. No; I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to one of his items in his transporation account, which I do not think the gentleman will hold is a legitimate transportation item. The gentleman is always accurate, but I see he has charged the salaries of the railway mail clerks into the item of transportation, and I do not think those salaries are legitimately chargeable to that.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I know what the gentleman from California has in mind. I recognize the justice of his criticism in that respect. The railway postal clerks are engaged not only in transportation, but to a very large degree in the sortation and distribution of the mails, and so far as that part of my statement is concerned it is fairly subject to the criticism which the gentleman makes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the origin of this appropriation. I trust I may have the attention of both sides of the House to this part of the remarks that I intend to make. Mr. Chairman, it does seem as if there were no sentiment either in this House or out of it in favor of economy in the public expenditures. By and by the representatives of the people and the people themselves will wake up to the abyss toward which we are running. In the last Congress more than one billion five hundred millions of the public moneys were appropriated. Appropriations are increasing upon every side. At the present time there is not a branch of the public service but what is knocking at the doors for an increase in its share of public money.

Now, as to the origin of this particular appropriation. The Post-Office bill for the fiscal year 1893 contained a very innocent provision for an inquiry into the process of transferring mails by pneumatic tube. There was a small appropriation of $10,000 and a direction that the Postmaster-General should report to Congress upon the subject. Whether he did report or not I do not know. I have not had the opportunity to find out. But the project remained silent until it appeared in the appropriation bill passed June 9, 1896, and I invite your attention to that date. Upon that date Mr. Wilson was Postmaster-General of the United States and Charles Neilson was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the United States. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General controls all transportation questions. In that bill was this appropriation:

The Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, use not exceeding the sum of $35,000 of this amount in the transportation of mail by pneumatic tube or other similar devices.

Up to that time there had been no appropriation for the pneumatic-tube service. There was a change of administration. Mr. Neilson left the office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General and was succeeded by the able and accomplished gentleman who now holds that office.

I call the attention of the committee to the subsequent history of Mr. Neilson's connection with this enterprise. In the testimony taken by the Postal Commission there is contained the testimony given by Mr. John E. Milholland on the 2d day of August, 1898. He was examined with respect to the question of whether any public men were in any way interested in the pneumatic-tube service. He said:

I also wanted to say in regard to one other public man, Mr. Charles Neilson, that after his retirement as Second Assistant Postmaster-General, he came here and an arrangement was made to have him represent the company at Washington for one year. He was made a director of the company—and was to look after matters at Washington. An arrangement was made for one year, and he was paid for that one year's service a thousand dollars, that being allowed him for traveling expenses, and he was also given $10,000 of the stock of the company.

That is, the Pneumatic Company of New York—

Q. How long did this occur after his retirement from office?

Mr. LITTLE. I hope we may have order. I am very desirous of hearing the statement the gentleman has made, and I wish he would repeat it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It is only from a sense of public duty that I speak of these things. It is unpleasant for me to do it, but I do so because I have been charged by this House as a member of the Postal Commission to investigate the question. If the attention of the House could be secured to its consideration, this appropriation would die the death it ought to. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman that if he will smoke the scoundrels out, this side of the House will stay with him.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I was stating that the first appropriation was made when Mr. Neilson was Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under whose administration?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not want to bring any politics into it at all. Within six weeks, at the outside, after he left the office, he was given a thousand dollars in cash and $10,000 in stock for his services at Washington during the succeeding year. What they were I do not know. What they could properly be I can not guess; but he was given this stock, and the testimony in regard to its value was this:

Q. Has it now an ascertainable market value?
A. The only sale of that stock that I can recall was in the summer; I think the stock was sold at 95 asked and 90 bid.

Mr. BINGHAM. Dollars or cents?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Dollars.

That was the only transaction that I can recall.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Let me finish just here. I ought in justice to put in this question and answer:

Q. Was any arrangement made with Mr. Neilson at the time he was holding office?
A. None whatever.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What are you reading from?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I am reading from the testimony taken by the Postal Commission, given on the 2d day of August, 1898, the testimony of John E. Milholland, representative of the New York Pneumatic Tube Company.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now may I ask if we can get that report?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I know of no way that the gentleman can get that report except by borrowing it from some member of the commission.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to have the whole report.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is entitled to have the whole report, and I think whatever else the Postal Commission does before this Congress adjourns, it ought to print and put at the disposal of members all the evidence that it has.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. GAINES. What did this man do in this matter, and who employed him down here?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The Pneumatic Tube Company employed him.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that he is one of the editors of the New York Tribune?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I do not know whether he is or not, and I do not care whether he is or not.

Mr. SULZER. Well, he is.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That testimony was taken for the use of Congress, and taken in an attempt to remedy the evils which exist in our postal service, and it ought to be submitted to Congress and to the whole American people.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I hope the gentleman will not say "Congress;" we have been shut out.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman now permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the fact that the testimony before the commission seems to be, so far as the House is concerned, a sealed book, I would ask how many pages of that testimony pertain to the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It covers, I would reply, very many pages.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to ask that it be made a part of the RECORD, in connection with the gentleman's statement. It is pertinent to this debate, and it will be pertinent to the debate in the other Chamber. I think this House is entitled to have it in connection with the gentleman's statement, which I fully credit, and full information upon the subject. We may not have it otherwise until the close of the session, and I think we should have it in connection with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I should be very glad that the House should have it, but I should not want to print all this testimony as an appendix to my statement. It would be an abuse of the privileges of the RECORD, an abuse that I have not been guilty of, and I will not abuse it; but as one member of the Postal Commission I will do what I can to present all the testimony to the public and to Congress before the close of this session of Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not think it would be any abuse of the RECORD. In view of the charge that the gentleman has made, he ought to give the evidence of it to the House.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I have made no charge; I make no charge. I trust these facts may be explained consistently with principle of honest conduct on the part of public officials; but I say that these facts call for an explanation, and I say that these facts call upon us to hesitate in going further in this pathway.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman; there was other testimony before the commission. I shall mention no names, and I regret extremely to have to speak upon this subject. But we found that the pneumatic-tube system in New York was constructed by contractors who took their pay in stock and bonds; that the only value which that stock and those bonds had was the contract with the Government. It was certainly unfortunate—I think nothing else, believe nothing else, but unfortunate—it was certainly unfortunate that a holder of the bonds and one of the contractors was a member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

A MEMBER. Give us his name.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I decline to state.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the report develop that fact?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman state his name?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I will not. As showing the methods employed by the New York company, I will state that a large block of the stock of this company as a New Year's present was sent to a near relative of an important and influential member of the House. I am glad to say that the return mail was not allowed to depart from Washington without carrying back that dishonoring and dishonorable gift. [Applause.]

Before the Post-Office Committee there came a representative of the parent company, who said, "We want to extend it to twenty-seven cities in the Union," and he named them. My friend from Ohio, Mr. BROMWELL, pointed out the coincidence that he had happened to include every member of the committee except my friend from Connecticut, Mr. SPERRY, and I do not know how he happened to be overlooked.

I only quote from the statement of Mr. BROMWELL, and I know nothing more about it than that. If my friend supposes for a moment that I intended that as a reflection upon any member of the committee, or intended to suggest for one moment that anyone was influenced in any degree by that statement, I beg to withdraw it, because no committee in this House holds my respect in a greater degree than the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; and no man in this House, or out of it, holds my respect for his honesty, his integrity, his courage, every day in the year and in every contingency of his duty, to a greater degree than does the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. [Applause.]

We are all of us courageous at times; he is courageous always. We all of us look to our duty at times; he follows it as the compass points to the North Star, and I would not say a word that could be construed to reflect upon him or any of his associates. I would sooner let my tongue wither and drop from my mouth than do that.

Mr. LOUD. I ought to suggest to the gentleman that the chairman of the committee represents a district in which it was not proposed to extend the service, and that quite a number of members of the committee are gentlemen who have no cities in which it was proposed to extend it.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I quoted from the hearing before the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. DOLLIVER. What cities now enjoy the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Philadelphia, New York, and Boston.

Mr. BINGHAM. And Brooklyn.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I included Brooklyn in New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I shall not be accused of any feeling of locality when I point to the record before the Post-Office Committee, and the statement there of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that if this appropriation should be granted, that its first use would be in the city of Boston. It is well conducted; it is honestly conducted there; it has a more valuable function in the city of Boston by reason of the relation of the post-office to the two great terminal stations which make it of greater use there than in any other city in the country.

My friends desire me to support the appropriation, and the public officials and some of the business community of Boston have written me asking me to support it. I can not do it. I believe it is fraught with evil, and I believe it will unduly swell the public expenditures. I would be glad to remain silent upon this proposition, and I wish I could; but, knowing these things, I could not remain silent and hold my seat upon this floor.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does your argument go to the extent of abolishing the service in the places where it is now in operation?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. My argument would go to the extent of keeping the contracts which we have with the companies, which run a year or two longer, and then stop it.

A MEMBER. Why should we do that?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Well, we have made the contract. If it is the judgment of the House that we should cut off this service altogether, I acquiesce. I simply stated what I would be willing to do and what I think we ought to do.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman understands, of course, that the contract depends upon the appropriation; and there will be no bad faith in discontinuing the service if we want to do so.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The contract, as I understand, is made conditional upon the annual appropriation; and if Congress should see fit to discontinue all these contracts, it can do so.

A few words more, and I have done. The experience of foreign countries has been quoted in favor of the pneumatic tube. There is no experience in those countries which warrants the course of conduct upon which we are entering. In Berlin, in Paris, and in London there are pneumatic tubes; but they are owned by the post-office department itself; and a special stamp—from five to six and a half cents—is required upon every piece of mail which goes through those tubes. That is an entirely different proposition from the one we have here.

The gentleman from California said the other day that he hoped we should not undertake to go into the business of owning and operating pneumatic tubes. Well, sir, our experience with the Post-Office Department is not such as would lead us to believe that the Government can manage any great undertaking very successfully from a financial point of view. Yet there is a difference between extending this pneumatic-tube service under Government ownership and entering upon an entirely new service. If there be places here and there where the pneumatic tube is useful in the public service, let us build it ourselves and operate it ourselves. It is not a new undertaking; it is part of the present equipment of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CORLISS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I have but a few minutes remaining, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. CORLISS. As I understand the argument of the gentleman, he is criticising the methods of introducing and operating these tubes rather than the use of the tube itself.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I want to say now a few words about the use of the tube. My remarks, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has just indicated, have heretofore been directed to another view of this question.

Mr. CORLISS. I should like to hear what the gentleman thinks of the practicability and value of the pneumatic tube if operated honestly for the best service of the post-offices in the cities.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Chairman, what is the proposition before us? I am afraid to enter upon it. We shall have all this service controlled by one company before we get very much further into it. I have in my hand an advertisement of the American Pneumatic-Tube Service Company, which, as appears by this advertisement, has an authorized capital of $15,000,000. The prospectus states, among other things, that the company owns and controls the patent for constructing pneumatic tubes; that it controls the pneumatic-tube system in Boston, carrying mail from the general office to the Northern Union Station, and is constructing another system in that city. It has under negotiation, as the prospectus states, "franchises for the leading cities of the country, so as to own and manage the pneumatic-tube service for streets and inside buildings."
